We apparently still own Hollywood, and an amulet made Colbert do it

Google search blames Jews

Google says it's working to fix a bug in which users who type "Who runs Hollywood?" end up with the search result "the Jews." "This has been flagged to us, we are working to get it removed as quickly as possible," a Google spokesperson said earlier this month when the issue made headlines. But as of last week, the second result listed when entering "Who runs Hollywood" into Google was "Meet the Jews Who Own Hollywood and the Media."

BDSers smear new host over hummus

Boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) activists are angry over a mention of the partially Israeli-owned hummus brand Sabra on Stephen Colbert's debut episode of CBS' Late Show Sept. 8. In a skit, Colbert said an "ancient cursed amulet" is "forcing him to make "certain regrettable compromises" by plugging products on his show. "The amulet commands me to inform you of the delicious taste of tonight's sponsor, Sabra roasted red pepper hummus. It's made from simple, fresh ingredients that bring people together one bite at a time," Colbert said, scooping the hummus on camera. Sabra is a U.S.-based company co-owned by Israeli food manufacturer Strauss and the multinational PepsiCo. Sabra said it was honoured to be a sponsor, while some Twitter commenters said Colbert's reference in the skit to doing the "devil's bidding" was a secret shout-out to BDSers.

Does Tal Ben-Haim use witchcraft?

Soccer dark arts spoil Wales' day

Israeli soccer player Tal Ben-Haim may be a witch, at least according to the British press. In a Sept. 6 Euro 2016 qualifier match between the Israeli and Welsh national teams, the centre back, who plays for Maccabi Tel Aviv in the Israeli league, made peculiar hand gestures at the ball as an opponent was preparing to take a free kick. Moments later, Wales striker Gareth Bale, a clutch scorer for soccer powerhouse Real Madrid, rocketed a kick over the goal. The match ultimately ended in a 0-0 draw, with some media outlets blaming Ben-Haim. Bale's miss was the effect of a "malevolent spell," said Wales Online, while the Independent said Ben-Haim employed the "dark arts." ■

CIJA doesn't speak for all

The hypocrisy of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is breathtaking. Its CEO Shimon Fogel and chair David Cape write ("The Jewish community needs unity, not uniformity," Sept. 3) that CIJA is non-partisan, yet there is hardly a Conservative government policy that CIJA has not supported, including Bill C-51 on security and changes to refugee law which included denial of health care to pregnant refugee women and sick children.

Fogel and Cape declare that Jewish law demands the election of "tovei ha'ir" (community council) as a matter of "governance at the community level." Yet CIJA's board of directors is self-appointed with no opportunity for input or voting by ordinary community members. CIJA remains the unelected de facto representative of the Jewish community, participating in political affairs through representation at parliamentary committee hearings or being regularly quoted in the mainstream media.

Finally, CIJA has utterly failed to achieve what Fogel and Cape enunciate as "Jewish law oblig[ing] attention to the value of diversity and the critical role of minority opinion." CIJA has never included in its public statements or policies any opinion that differs from its own self-selected leadership.

Perhaps if the governing party changes after the October federal election, CIJA may want to consider transforming itself from a prop for the Conservative party to a representative and democratic organization that embraces all in the Jewish community.

BDS vote is anti-Semitism

Is it really the Palestinian and "occupation" issues that so aggrieve the General Council of the United Church of Canada that they voted for boycotts, sanctions and divestment (BDS) aimed at Israel ("United Church strengthens call to end Israeli occupation," Aug. 20)?

The world is witness to atrocities so unimaginable to us, and yet it is unbelievable that the General Council's only focus is on Israel. And yet, with all its concern for the Palestinians, no consideration has been given to compensate the Palestinians made jobless by SodaStream's move to the Negev. The plight of these 600 jobless Palestinians can be attributed to the BDS movement, yet there is no mention of their fate.

For centuries, the church has harassed us, maligned us, denigrated us, robbed us, victimized us, evicted us, and killed us with pogroms, crusades, inquisitions and more recently the Holocaust.

And, wonder of wonders, we are still here. So now you are trying BDS.

In the United Church's zeal for BDS, I hope it includes boycotting any and all ophthalmological, pharmaceutical, dental, medical, surgical, neurological, scientific, technical and agricultural advances made by Jews and Jews in Israel. However, I don't believe you will throw away your cellphones, GPS, voicemail, etc.

I wonder what would happen if Jews imposed a similar BDS on the followers of BDS. But Jews are not of this mindset. They continue to contribute to the good of mankind, despite the senseless hatred, jealousy and envy perpetrated against them by the anti-Semites of this world.

Liberals no friends of Israel

Gabriel Erem, formerly of Lifestyles magazine, is to be congratulated for initiating the controversy involving the invitation from Honey and Barry Sherman to meet Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau and York Centre candidate Michael Levitt and by refusing to attend ("JDL to protest at private fundraiser for Trudeau," Aug. 27).

I always found it astounding that prominent members of the Jewish community can support the Liberal Party of Canada. Apart from the revelation that Trudeau is surrounded by a number of pro-Palestinian and anti-Israel advisers, one need only look at Canada's lack of support at the United Nations from one Liberal government to another.

Whenever it came to motions condemning Israel, the most Jews in Canada could hope for was that Canada would abstain, but more times than not, Canada voted in favour of those resolutions.

That lack of support for Israel only stopped when Stephen Harper was elected prime minister, and since then, his unqualified support for the State of Israel has been something every Jew in Canada should honour and cherish.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Awakening to the Syrian refugee crisis

Whenever the worst in humanity emerges, Jews are first in line to help out and can be counted on to display the best in humanity

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: Coinciding with the High Holiday season, the world has woken up to the Syrian refugee crisis. The awful death of three-year old Alan Kurdi, his brother and mother has left us with indelible images of the human costs of this tragedy.

Looking in the machzor, I see the Unetaneh Tokef prayer, with the words, "Who by fire, and who by water" and I think of those drowned trying to reach safe shores. It is not a new problem – either in terms of the current refugee crisis, or the history of human suffering – but it is addressing us with urgency this year.

I announced on Rosh Hashanah that our temple will sponsor a Syrian refugee family, just as we sponsored families when the Vietnamese boat people came. I hope that in this way, we can make a difference in the new year.

Rabbi Korobkin: My mother was one of the 10,000 children saved during World War II on the Kindertransport by the British. Although her parents perished, had it not been for Britain's compassion for a refugee, neither she nor her entire family would be alive today. So I certainly feel the obligation to welcome as many refugees as we can.

That said, our shul, in consultation with the Canadian government, will be working on sponsoring Christian and other non-Muslim refugees from Syria. These refugees' lives are the most endangered at present, since it's too dangerous for them to even be in refugee camps. They include Yazidis, Chaldeans, Armenians and many others.

I applaud your efforts and hope that HaShem allows us to "pay it forward." We can do no less.

Rabbi Grushcow: Rabbi Jonathan Sacks recently wrote about the refugee crisis, and he, too, cited the Kindertransport. He then went on to say something that I think is essential: "I used to think that the most important line in the Bible was 'Love your neighbour as yourself.' Then I realized that it is easy to love your neighbour, because he or she is usually quite like yourself. What is hard is to love the stranger, one whose colour, culture or creed is different from yours."

> God knows there are plenty of people who need help, and I believe God counts on us all to do it.

Like you, we will work with the government and other agencies to find a family to support. We will not specify a non-Muslim family, nor will we look specifically for one of any particular faith. At times like this, I think it is our shared humanity that matters most of all.

God knows there are plenty of people who need help, and I believe God counts on us all to do it. There will be people affected by this long after the headlines have moved onto other topics. Together, may we have the passion and persistence to respond.

Rabbi Korobkin: The reality we all have to face is that no matter how many refugees Canada, Europe, the United States or any other country will be willing to accept, there simply is no way to absorb the more than four million refugees that are displaced and trying to find sanctuary. Until a solution is found on the ground to deal with ISIS, we simply have to triage the best we can.

One thing that the Jewish People are good at is making lemonade out of lemons. When people are in crisis, we are zealously the first in line to give tzedakah and help out. Whenever the worst in humanity emerges, you can count on our people to display the best in humanity.

May this new year augur blessings for the refugees and the entire world. ■

Judaism and journalism

At a recent symposium entitled "Journalism and Judaism," hosted by the Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash in Toronto, I was asked how journalism contributes positively to society, in spite of the fact that the media are often viewed with mistrust by the Jewish community. My answer was that journalism offers three benefits to readers: it informs and educates, it brings people together and it empowers individuals. (You can watch the entire conversation at koshertube.com.)

Each week, when you pick up your copy of The Canadian Jewish News, you engage in the process of learning – you discover things you didn't know before, and digest new perspectives and opinions on subjects you thought you knew. It's part of our collective continuing education – and once we acquire that knowledge, we can share it, which makes us all smarter. For most journalists I know, that's one of the greatest professional satisfactions, and if we aren't contributing some kind of learning on a regular basis to our readers, then we're not doing our jobs.

Journalism also has the power to reduce boundaries and bring communities closer by sparking important conversations. This is especially true in non-partisan publications, like The CJN, where the focus is less on points of argument and divergence and more about the exchange of ideas and positions. Each week in these pages, you can find stories and commentary from a wide spectrum of Jewish views – in many cases, the opinions expressed may very well contradict each other. But by publishing conflicting ideas side by side, our hope is that we are diminishing divisions and building bridges in the Jewish community. If these ideas can live together in our pages, surely they can coexist beyond The CJN as well.

But if journalism can be a positive for communities, it is also empowering on the personal level. I am constantly awed by the number of excellent writers out there in the Jewish community, most of whom have little or no idea of the depth of their talent. We often hear from writers who seemingly come out of nowhere to deliver quality journalism – sometimes they offer emotional narratives based on personal experiences, other times they present nuanced analyses of current events, or reconstructions of forgotten bits of history. Whatever the subject or style, there is an incredible wealth of potential out there, and we consider it one of our most important duties to tap into that, especially when it comes to younger writers.

In that spirit, The CJN has launched our first contest for excellence in Jewish writing, open to writers between the ages of 19 and 29. It's our attempt to expose the Jewish community to its next generation of journalists.

The rules are simple: Essays must be between 500 and 1,000 words and focus on a Jewish theme – the rest is up to your imagination. The deadline for submissions is Oct. 22, and the best essays will be published by The CJN.

And if that's not motivation enough, how's this: The winning essayist gets $1,800. (The contest is open to all Canadians and residents of Canada, excluding Quebec.)

Send your entries to contest@thecjn.ca. We're looking forward to reading your work. ■ — YONI

REFLECTIONS

The most unhappy time of my childhood

Rabbi Allan Levine

All of my adult life, I have been active in the struggle for civil rights and social justice. The sources for this passion were my personal experiences as a child and youth, my upbringing at home, the profound influence of my congregational rabbi, the impact of study of the prophets at rabbinical school, and the impact of the Holocaust on my life.

My Canadian-born parents had attended college but did not complete their studies. My family, during my childhood, went through a number of periods of economic hardship. In the early '40s after not being able to pay the rent for a number of months, we were evicted from the house we rented. During World War II it was impossible to find housing. We were forced to move to an agricultural rural community outside of Montreal where we were the only Jewish family in the community and I was the only Jewish child in an enormous school. About a year later, we moved back to Montreal. My mother and I lived with my grandmother and two unmarried aunts. I slept in a bedroom with one of my aunts. My brother Marvin, six years older than me, lived in an apartment with relatives, and my father lived in a hotel.

This was the most unhappy time of my childhood. We knew what poverty was about. Everyone tried their best to be warm with us, but each of us knew that we were an imposition and an interference in the privacy of others. Today, I know we were lucky. There were many in similar circumstances without family willing to sacrifice and take them in.

A "Gentiles Only" sign from 1932 ONTARIO JEWISH ARCHIVES, BLANKENSTEIN FAMILY HERITAGE CENTRE

As a child, that had never occurred to me. All that I understood was that the family was so poor that we could not be together. During this period, I think that my brother suffered the most. At least my mother and I lived in the same house. Then our economic situation improved. Around 1944, my brother saved the day. He knew of a British war refugee family that was returning to Great Britain; we got their apartment and were reunited as a normal family.

We never lived in a "Jewish neighbourhood." At home, I never heard a racist remark or disparagement of another person's religion. Black students studying with me in high school often came to my house to prepare homework. For me, this was part of the normality of my life.

The environment at home was very different from that of the schools I attended and the broader communities in which we dwelt. Frequently, I fell victim to anti-Semitism. I felt the pain in my bones and my psyche. Often I was called "dirty Jew" and heard other disparaging remarks from schoolmates and neighbours (some of them friends), teachers (both in public school and in high school), shopkeepers or just people on the streets. It was not uncommon for me to be called "Christ killer," "cheating Jew," "money-grabbing Jew," "kike" and to hear, "too bad Hitler didn't kill all the Jews." Anti-Semitic jokes were common amongst teachers and friends.

As I was a young child residing on streets without other Jewish families, my neighbouring friends were all non-Jewish. Most of these friends were not anti-Semitic, but sometimes I heard painful remarks. My best friend's mother, a wonderful human being, once called me aside and told me, "You must go home before my husband returns from work. He does not permit Jews in our home. You can play with Dick [her son] in our house and as much as you want while my husband is at work, but it will be very bad for Dick and for me if my husband finds you here or knows that you have been here." Now, 60 years later, I can still visualize the scene and feel the pain – mine, her's and Dick's.

Another type of pain was in my battered bones and bloody bruises from having been physically attacked and beaten on my way to school and on the way home from school. Normally, these beatings by schoolmates were accompanied by a litany of encouragement from the anti-Semitic chorus of the audience of onlookers.

I particularly remember a trauma shared with my father. My father, a salesman, invited me to join him on a four- or five-day sales trip covering well over 1,000 miles. Usually, we stayed at hotels at night. One day, we walked into a very large and famous store with his samples and catalogues. After about an hour, he came out beaming with a very substantial order. The store owner shook my father's hand, said goodbye and how wonderful it was to see his old friend again. My father was absolutely elated with his warm reception at this store and his significant sale.

A few hours later, as evening approached, my father, looking for a hotel and finding no rooms available, said, "My friend, the owner of that store, has a magnificent lodge. Let's go and sleep there."

As we were driving through the sumptuous grounds towards the lodge, I saw a small sign on the grass: "No Jews or dogs allowed." Either my father didn't notice the sign, or he chose not to mention it to me. We entered the hotel and this same friend ran to my father before he could approach the desk, put his arm around my father's shoulder and said to him, "I am sorry Harry, but I am sure you understand," and off we went to continue to look for a hotel.

My father was clearly hurt, though he did not say a word, but I have never forgotten that moment. ■

Rabbi Allan Levine was born in Montreal. He currently lives in Israel.

Is pay-to-pray a sustainable model for shuls?

As more and more Jewish families consider whether to pay their dues, synagogues are experimenting with new membership formulas

LILA SARICK
LSarick@thecjn.ca

Harris (not his real name) had made his children's bar and bat mitzvahs at what he thought of as his synagogue. But when divorce and a business downturn forced him to ask for a reduction on his shul dues, he was rebuffed.

"They gave me such a hard time. They made me feel so belittled," he recalls.

"Most synagogues say pay what you can, but to get to that point, you're already humbled and embarrassed."

He left and has never again joined a synagogue.

Harris' story is a cautionary tale for synagogues as they try to find creative ways to keep the lights turned on and the rabbi paid. Increasingly, they are finding members are unwilling or unable to pay dues or even join in the first place.

Even discussing the issue is delicate. Many synagogues do not post their fee schedules on their websites and do not relish talking about dues. Some synagogues are even moving away from calling the annual payments dues.

Rabbi Levi Gansburg

"Dues implies fee for service," said Paul Leszner, president of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism. For Jews who may only attend over Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, they may feel they're "not getting value for their money."

Synagogue dues across the country (Building fund fees not included)

Synagogue	Denomination	Dues
Congregation Beth Israel – Vancouver	Conservative	fair share – 2% pre-tax income, max. $4,800
Or Shalom Synagogue – Vancouver	Renewal	family $1,700
Sephardic Kehila Centre-Abir Yaakob Congregation – Toronto	Orthodox Sephardi	family $1,500
Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue – Toronto	Conservative	family $2,160 single parent $1,150
Makom – Toronto	Unafilliated	none
City Shul – Toronto	Reform	individual $700-$1,600 family $1,250-$2,500
Shaarei Shomayim Congregation – Toronto	Orthodox	based on income – from $2,000-$3,000
Chabad of Danforth/Beaches – Toronto	Chabad	none (suggested donation $180 per family)
Chabad of York Mills – Toronto	Chabad	family $1,800
Or Haneshamah – Ottawa	Reconstructionist	one-adult family $650 two-adult family $1,250
Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom – Montreal	Reform	family $1,780 single parents $1,250
Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem – Montreal	Orthodox	family $1,225
Shaar Shalom Congregation – Halifax	Conservative	family $1,880

Instead Reform congregations are referring to an "annual commitment" or use the biblical word trumah.

"You're making a commitment to the work a synagogue is going to do. You're belonging to a community. You can participate as you like," Leszner said.

In some dues-averse Chabad shuls, fees may be called partnerships or memberships, said Rabbi Levi Gansburg, who leads Toronto's Chabad of York Mills.

"We don't want it [paying dues] to have that stigma," he said.

With dues for two-parent families starting at more than $1,000 and rising steeply, it is apparent why the fees are a touchy issue.

"In general, people are feeling the pinch. It's difficult to find it [money for dues] in your household budget, and joining a synagogue isn't a given anymore," said Cindy Joseph, chair of the membership committee at Beth Radom Congregation, a Toronto Conservative synagogue.

"We find we're having to sell people on what value they're going to get."

Beth Radom recently introduced a 25 per cent discount for new members who also have children in Jewish day school.

Synagogues, facing a growing gap between what they bring in and what they spend, are re-thinking the way they fund themselves, said Barry Mael, the New York-based director of kehilla operations and finance for the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

The most common method of charging a flat rate, often based on age, with deep discounts for new members, doesn't offer the flexibility and discretion needed, Mael said.

"Someone wants to start a relationship [with a synagogue] and you're already having to cut a deal," Mael said, referring to complicated fee structures.

Some shuls have found it easier, and more equitable, to use what is called a fair-share model, in which members pay based on their income.

Unetaneh Tokef in heels

Avrum Rosensweig

She walked into shul trying to not appear haughty. It was Rosh Hashanah, and she had dressed well for the occasion, for the people. She would impress.

Over and over, she imagined how she would get to her seat in the middle of the row, having to squeeze by the entire Goldman family to do so. How humiliating.

She thought that having her family name on the sanctuary would secure her a better seat, but that was not the case. The committee explained the place she wanted belonged to the Rosensteins, who had their name on the entire building. It made sense.

A man finished the Haftorah about Hannah, the childless woman. She stood with the congregation as the Torah was safely returned to the Aron Kodesh. The rabbi said, "Please take your seats." He began his sermon.

"He is no longer with us. She has passed from this world," the rabbi said sadly. "'Who shall live and who shall die' was answered through the death of our loved ones this year. Their time on this earth is over. They will not return to us. They are now with the angels. They are now with God."

A tear fell to her dress. She was about to sob. The tastefully dressed woman wanted desperately to leave, but she couldn't. She was wedged, like a branch in a dam, into her seat. Exiting without embarrassing herself – squeezing past that family again – was just too much.

"Who by fire?," the rabbi asked. "Who by the sword? Who shall have rest and who shall wander?"

So she closed her eyes ever so tightly. The child's image appeared again. He sat on the beach by the water, rigorously with clarity of purpose, scooping sand into and out of a deep hole he had created. His blond hair flowed and he laughed uncontrollably, a sort of soulful chortle, still connected to God.

> The tastefully dressed woman wanted desperately to leave, but she couldn't.

"Will we survive this year, 5776, my fellow Jews?" the rabbi wondered aloud.

He laughed again. She heard it clearly. She saw his eyes bright, never did they dim, looking at her, bidding her to dig with him, around him.

The rabbi's voice grew louder.

"How many shall pass away and how many shall be born?" he yelled this time.

It startled the little beach boy. He began to cry, and he reached for her. He reached for her. And the lady wriggled in her chair, sobbing, her arms stuck to her side unable to budge.

"Who shall live and who shall die?" the rabbi asked quietly. "We do not know, yet we are all here today to ask God that we are the Shehechiyanu in His prayer, that we are the ones sustained, enabled with His breath, that we deserve life."

His voice bellowed: "Baruch atah Adoshem, Elokeinu Melech Haolam, she-hechiyanu v'kiyimanu v'higiyanu lazman hazeh. Blessed are You, Lord our God, King of the Universe, who has granted us life, sustained us and enabled us to reach this occasion."

The sandcastle was filled, its demarcations invisible. The little boy was no longer.

The congregation stood for Kaddish. Then those sitting next to the elegant mother stepped into the aisle, allowing her to find her way out and, with dignity, find her way home.

She expressed a tearful look of appreciation and walked gracefully to the door, looking ravishing with every step.

The usher smiled respectfully. She smiled in return. ■

My problem with Kol Nidrei

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

Kol Nidrei should have disappeared a long time ago. After its introduction in the 800s, it was sharply opposed for the next 400 years by rabbinic authorities who saw it as a meaningless gesture. In the 1100s, a debate emerged over which vows, future or past, Kol Nidrei refers to. And in the 19th century, because of anti-Semitic claims that it enabled Jews to violate oaths, many reformers (and even, for short time, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch) removed Kol Nidrei from the service. It is a problematic prayer.

So why is Kol Nidrei still part of the service? Only because of the melody. There are moving tunes, in both the Ashkenazi and the Sephardi tradition, for Kol Nidrei. No matter what, it is here to stay because the tunes are majestic and awe-inspiring.

This was my problem with Kol Nidrei. I was trained in Lithuanian-style yeshivot to think about serious Jewish content, about talmudic texts and theological sources; Kol Nidrei is the opposite of that. Kol Nidrei is a ritual that hangs by less than a thread of hair, with an inferior halachic pedigree, and is only preserved because of its tune. It bothered me that it is religious fluff, all musical culture and minimal religious content. So why did it find a place of honour leading off the Yom Kippur liturgy?

Frankly, contemporary Judaism is overstocked with religious fluff. There was an advertisement many years ago from a yeshiva in Jerusalem that had a picture of a bagel, lox and cream cheese sandwich with the caption: "Is this the culmination of 3,000 years of Jewish history?" This sadly is all too often the case, with Jewish identity reduced to the soundtrack of Fiddler on the Roof, brisket and satin kippahs. This superficial cultural Judaism offers no rationale for continuity, and no true link to spirituality.

Because of this, I saw content and culture as antagonists. To me, bagels, lox and cream cheese Judaism was the opposite of the Judaism that nurtured me in yeshiva. And even the melodies like Kol Nidrei were just superficial enhancements, pleasant, but ultimately unimportant.

But I was wrong. Culture is important too. Melodies, foods, even jokes have a role in preserving Judaism.

In the language of Halachah, we call these elements a minhag, or a custom. Minhag is about the little distinctive cultural touches that make observance more fascinating. Rabbi Maimon (the father of the Rambam) wrote about the importance of respecting customs like eating doughnuts (sfinj) on Chanukah. Indeed, it is often the customs, with their distinctive tastes, aromas, colours and melodies that inspire us in ways we are not fully aware of.

What my overly intellectual perspective had missed is this: that the little things, the aromas, tastes, colours and melodies, are a powerful way of conveying the content, the great ideas I so love. Culture can create an emotional connection unavailable in the world of ideas.

And this is the power of Kol Nidrei, the power of singing the same song as our grandparents, even if the words are obscure. And even the intellectually inclined among us should never overlook it.

In 1913, a young intellectual decided to convert to Christianity. As a final farewell to Judaism, he decided to go to Yom Kippur services. But after listening to Kol Nidrei, he left a transformed man. In the years that followed, this man, Franz Rozensweig, became a prominent Jewish philosopher and inspired many others to make their journey back to Judaism.

Ironically, a great intellectual was drawn back to Judaism by Kol Nidrei, a prayer that is more melody than meaning. And even today, otherwise alienated Jews show up for Kol Nidrei, drawn in by the inspiring melody.

Now, if we could only teach our alienated Jews how to love the content, to engage the ideas of Judaism as well. ■

Jaslo on Spadina: memories and reflections

Rabbi Dow Marmur

The recreation on Spadina Road in Toronto's Forest Hill of the façade of the synagogue in Jaslo, Poland, that was destroyed during the Holocaust is touching.

Though I don't remember the synagogue, perhaps because my parents didn't go there or didn't take me, I've memories of other places in the town: our apartment, the main street with an ice cream stand where I'd be taken for treats, my father's office in the local glassworks, and friends.

My only happy childhood memories are from Jaslo. My parents moved there before I was born and we lived in the town until Sept. 1, 1939, the day Germany invaded Poland. The Jewish owner of the glassworks had a farm not far from the city then called Lwow or Lemberg, now Lviv in Ukraine, and offered to take my mother and me there. My father joined us later.

That's how we survived. In the pact between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, that part of what had been Poland came under Soviet occupation, and we were thus saved from the crematoria where the rest of the Jews of Jaslo ended up. The Soviets deported us to Siberia. After about a year there, and some four years in Uzbekistan, we returned to Poland in 1946, hungry and confused, yet alive.

But not to Jaslo. The town had been devastated during the war. Some of the workers who were ready to restart the glassworks asked my father to manage it. Prudently, he declined. Within two years, we left for Sweden.

I returned to Jaslo more than three decades later with my wife and family. Our aim was to show our children our roots. My wife Fredzia was born in Lodz, Poland's second-largest city, and survived the war in its ghetto and in a German concentration camp. She was rescued with her mother by the Swedish Red Cross a few days before the end of the war.

When we visited Jaslo, Poland was still under Communism and the town reflected its worst features. There was something ghost-like about it. The then-occupant allowed us to see the apartment where I had lived with my parents. Nothing seemed to have changed. Like everything else we saw in Jaslo, it was in need of a facelift.

They were even still blowing glass in the way I remembered it from my childhood. Modernization had passed them by.

There were no Jews in the town, and there aren't any today. In the 1950s, a memorial book about the Jews of Jaslo was published in Yiddish, also available in English, as a verbal monument to the dead.

The choice by the Toronto congregation to commemorate the synagogue in Jaslo is a laudable effort to remember a place of Jewish worship that was burned down by the Nazis twice – the first time local Poles tried to save it. My parents would often say that there was no anti-Semitism in the town, and I certainly don't remember any from my childhood.

However, the façade of the destroyed synagogue should in no way turn the Toronto version into a memorial shrine. Every Jewish institution being built today must be evidence of contemporary Judaism that's alive and thriving, despite the challenges and the memories.

There's a tendency in some quarters, particularly among those who've no personal experience of the destruction of European Jewry, to turn the Holocaust into a kind of religion that allows the past to control and perhaps stifle the present. The Shoah must indeed be commemorated at special events and in special places, but synagogues should be there to help worshippers celebrate the present and look toward the future.

I hope, therefore, that the room to commemorate the Holocaust that's planned for the new building won't be turned into a chapel. It's by living in the here and now that we make sure – in the Toronto Jewish philosopher Emil Fackenheim's famous words – that Hitler won't have a posthumous victory. ■

Does banning anti-Muslim remarks prevent radicalization?

Sheryl Saperia

The Quebec government has introduced Bill 59, which sets out to combat publicly disseminated hate speech and speech inciting violence.

While noble in intention, the bill contains many of the problems associated with Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act. Parliament repealed that contentious provision two years ago to protect free speech from the reaches of a zealous bureaucracy that struggled to distinguish between hateful and offensive speech. Moreover, defendants lacked basic rights to due process, a speedy trial, access to an attorney and even truth as a defence. Critics of Section 13 pointed out then, as do opponents of Bill 59, that the Criminal Code already covers hate speech and ensures those protections under the law.

The context in which Bill 59 has come about is also essential to understanding the full extent of its danger. Jacques Frémont, director of the Quebec Human Rights Commission and driver of these legislative changes, explained in a 2014 speech that he intended to use his new powers against people critical of Islam. No other religion was referenced. Meanwhile, Quebec Premier Phillipe Couillard brought the bill forward as part of his counter-radicalization program, implying in his remarks that one cause of Islamist radicalization is the existence of hateful speech against Islam.

Would prohibiting hate speech against Islam help to prevent radicalization?

The bill's proponents might answer in the affirmative. First, otherwise disenfranchised Muslims could feel a stronger sense of belonging and loyalty to their home. Second, the Muslim community might feel more accepted in society and, therefore, more willing to report concerns to the police. Third, individuals angry about remarks critical of Islam would have recourse through a non-violent, legal process.

Perhaps unwittingly, this approach is premised on a doctrine about the dynamics of radicalization that benefits the radicalizers. Moreover, the arguments against Bill 59 are far more compelling.

First, Canada already welcomes people of every background and proscribes discrimination under numerous legal instruments. Banning "hate speech" – an undefined term in the bill – and entrusting the enforcement of this vague prohibition to an activist human rights commission would disproportionately infringe on Canadians' right to freedom of speech, one of the fundamental cornerstones of a liberal democracy.

Second, Bill 59 would suppress legitimate viewpoints and concomitantly empower and embolden those sympathetic to an extremist Islamist narrative. Some very prominent moderate Muslim voices in this country have published articles in which they plead with policymakers not to allow their voices to be silenced by the bill. They note that those who speak out against honour killings or the death sentence for apostates and adulterers as problematic aspects of a radical Islamist worldview could be brought before a tribunal, charged an exorbitant fine and publicly shamed as hate speech offenders.

Third, we might assess Bill 59 within the framework of a recent article in the Atlantic titled "The coddling of the American mind." The authors of that piece examine the growing movement on college campuses to censor ideas and language that might adversely affect students' emotional well-being. They find that a "culture devoted to policing speech and punishing speakers," with an institutionalized fixation on micro-aggressions and trigger warnings, and the belief in having a right not to be offended, actually has the opposite intended effect on students' mental health. (Micro-aggressions are seemingly innocuous actions or words that are nonetheless considered violent. Trigger warnings are to be issued by professors if course materials might generate strong emotion.)

Bill 59 could run the risk of similar problems across the province, fostering a culture of victimhood, divisiveness and acrimony, and rendering our society unable to engage issues critically.

In the face of public outcry, Couillard has conceded the bill may excessively chill free speech. Quebecers and Canadians must continue to speak out for their right to speak freely. The frenzy of a federal election cannot distract us from contesting legislation whose impact will be felt far beyond provincial borders. ■

Jewish schools grapple with new sex ed curriculum

sshefa@thecjn.ca

With the start of the new school year came an added challenge for Jewish day school administrators in Toronto, some of whom have spent months working to implement the amendments to Ontario's new health and physical education curriculum, which includes changes to how and when sexual education issues are taught.

Under the revamped curriculum, which had not been updated since 1998, Grade 1 students are expected to learn the anatomically correct names of body parts, including sexual organs. Grade 2 students will learn about basic stages of human development.

Third graders will learn how to show respect for people with visible differences, such as skin colour, body shapes and sizes, people who have different physical abilities, and invisible differences, including "gender identity, sexual orientation, family background, and personal preferences."

In Grade 4, students will learn about bullying, both in person and online, as well as physical changes accompanying puberty and personal hygiene. In Grade 5, they'll learn about parts of the reproductive system, and what to expect from puberty.

Sixth graders will learn more about puberty, healthy relationships, and address stereotypes and assumptions. In Grade 7, students will be taught about the risks of early pregnancy, sexually transmitted diseases, and the concept of consent, and in Grade 8, topics including contraception, sexual intimacy, decisions about sexual activity, and discussions about gender identity and sexual orientation will be explored.

Rabbi Elliott Diamond

Eric Petersiel, head of school at Leo Baeck Day School, said the sexual education component is only a small part of the revamped health and physical education curriculum.

"Much of what is being taught is what we're already teaching through a combination of our physical education program and our guidance curriculum," Petersiel said.

"We've added additional time with the physical education specialist to present the health curriculum as a core part of the curriculum for every student from grades 1 to 5. For grades 6, 7 and 8, the more sensitive issues are delivered by a social worker from Jewish Family & Child and we pay to have that done so the kids can be split by gender and not have a teacher in the room and have a more open conversation about the more sensitive topics."

Petersiel said he's pleased with the new curriculum as a whole, because it tackles issues such as mental health and how to make positive, healthy choices in life.

"They deal with all the issues that we try to deal with, and they gave it a proper curriculum structure around self esteem, emotional development, understanding differences… So in Grade 3, there is [a lesson about] visible and invisible differences in people, and respect. These are all things, as a Jewish day school, that we take very seriously and have always made a core part of our home-base curriculum," he said.

"It's not about focusing on how we are going to help children create their own gender identity or their sexual orientation, it's about how we acknowledge that people are different from each other in a myriad of ways and how those differences are actually positives to make each person unique."

Amy Platt, director of general studies at Bialik Hebrew Day School, said the school has reviewed the new curriculum "carefully and believes that each of the expectations can be taught in an age-appropriate way and in a manner that suits the values that are integral to our school. During the course of this year, we will work with our homeroom and physical education teachers to facilitate an appropriate and measured approach" to implementing it.

Netivot HaTorah Day School's communications director referred to a statement Rabbi Elliott Diamond, head of Jewish studies, sent to The CJN last May regarding the new curriculum.

"While our school strives to implement the ministry's guidelines in the areas of core curriculum, we have chosen not to implement the health curriculum in its entirety. We feel that elements of the program – specifically the sex education sections – reflect a position that is not supported by our parent body and our religious perspective," Rabbi Diamond wrote.

Although private elementary schools are not obligated to follow the provincial curriculum, private high schools are.

Renee Cohen, principal of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy's Kimel campus in Vaughan, said high school students are required to take one course in health and physical education to earn their Ontario Secondary School Diploma.

"Our students in their Grade 9 year at TanenbaumCHAT take healthy active living education to satisfy this Ontario Ministry of Education requirement. Many students will continue to take physical education courses throughout their four years of high school, but it's only required as part of their Grade 9 year," Cohen said.

"As an accredited and ministry-inspected school, TanenbaumCHAT will follow the… curriculum, and we will teach all strands of the curriculum," she said, adding that physical education teachers at both TanenbaumCHAT campuses have worked together to revise lesson plans.

"We've always taught this as a health component, and a lot of what is in the new curriculum is similar to what was taught in the past." She added she's yet to hear from concerned parents about the new curriculum.

Rabbi Seth Grauer, head of school for Yeshivat Or Chaim, an Orthodox high school for boys, and Ulpanat Orot, its counterpart for girls, declined to comment for this story. Messages to Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, Robbins Hebrew Academy, and Associated Hebrew Schools were not immediately returned. ■

Maman makes his case for helping Yazidi captives

plungen@thecjn.ca

If no good deed goes unpunished, then Steve Maman understands why he's come under fire for helping bring Yazidi girls to freedom.

Recently a letter was published by a Yazidi group in Iraq questioning whether he had in fact helped liberate nearly 130 Yazidi girls who had been taken as slaves by Islamic State (ISIS) fighters and supporters.

Maman, who was in Toronto last week for a rally in support of Yazidis, told The CJN he has evidence to support his claims – fingerprints, statements, witnesses. The attacks from a small group of Yazidis in Iraq is nothing but domestic politics, Maman said. They are not community leaders and "they're doing this for political reasons, to get a seat in the next election [in Kurdistan]," he said.

Despite the naysayers, Maman has his backers. Speaking at the rally, Mirza Ismail, chair of Yezidi Human Rights Organization-International, who travels regularly to the Middle East to monitor the situation, endorsed Maman's role in freeing enslaved Yazidis.

And The Times of Israel quoted Rev. Andrew White, an Anglican priest living in Baghdad and who knows Maman's Iraqi contacts, as saying, "I don't question him or his motives one iota. The fact is that many women and children have been released from captivity because of this dear man."

For Maman, there's a moral imperative behind his work. He references the Jewish experience in Europe between 1939 and 1945, when the world stood by and did nothing. The ISIS attacks on the Yazidis is simply something he feels he cannot ignore.

It should have been addressed at least a year ago, when the genocide began, he said. There are only 30,000 ISIS fighters wreaking havoc in the region, suggesting a military option is necessary to bring their reign of terror to an end.

As for the public, "you can't say you didn't know. If you don't act, you don't care," he said.

So how does a guy from Montreal rescue young captives in a conflict thousands of miles away? For 20 years Maman, a native of Morocco, has been in the vintage car business, dealing directly with buyers in the Middle East. "I know the culture," he said.

He also knows powerful players in the region. A couple of years ago, he made some key connections while trying to acquire cars once owned by Saddam Hussein.

He convinced his Iraqi contacts to get involved with his efforts to free Yazidi slaves. They, too, both Sunnis and Shiites, are "appalled by ISIS," he said.

Leveraging his ties in the region, Maman set up a team of people, headed by an Iraqi who once worked for the U.S. army.

"They don't go in and get the children themselves. They work with contacts in Mosul [considered the ISIS capital], who work with the same purpose we do, to get the girls out and stop the pain."

The team negotiates the freedom of Yazidi girls – some of them as young as nine when they were sold in the Mosul market.

Maman stresses the girls are not ransomed. "There's no buying. All there is, is negotiating." When the "owner" is confronted with a message from a local Islamic authority telling him to release the girl, they release the girl, he said.

When he started his venture, he raised funds through GoFundMe. But his access to the crowdsourcing website was ended for reasons that remain unclear. Now he raises money through the website of the Liberation of Christian and Yazidi Children of Iraq [CYCI], a group he founded, as well as its Facebook page and supporters.

Speaking at the Toronto rally, Maman explained his rationale for creating the organization. He cited Rabbi Nachman of Breslov, a famous rabbi who died in the early 1800s, who said prayers said in seclusion are the most powerful, and God takes great pleasure in hearing them.

Jews uttered these prayers of pain and abandonment in Auschwitz, and he imagined Yazidis are saying similar ones today.

"I wanted to help these innocents because these prayers in seclusion, these prayers of distress, came once again 70 years later. This time, it came from Mosul. This time, it came from women and children. Some of whom saw their brothers, sons and husbands get beheaded in front of them before being taken away and sold as sex slaves. Being held in cages. Being underfed and beaten. Being raped up to 30 times a day. Being resold numerous times. Being treated like cattle. Basically, being killed every single day, without their soul leaving their body!"

Maman said people have two options: acting or being spectators. He chooses to act. ■

Ex-theatre head pleads guilty

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Michael Nathanson

With Michael Nathanson's guilty plea to a charge of forgery and partial restitution of the funds he stole, the board of directors of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT) has some closure on a sorry chapter in the 27-year-old theatre's history that almost put it out of business.

In the aftermath of his Sept. 2 sentencing, the board said it was "satisfied that justice has been served. While some restitution was made to the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, it was by no means made whole."

It added: "Our focus now is on the business of the theatre and its bright future under its new artistic director," referring to former Torontonian Ari Weinberg, who was hired last spring.

The WJT hired budding playwright Nathanson as its artistic director and general manager in 2007. In February 2014, it fired him ahead of a police investigation into allegations he had embezzled thousands of dollars from the theatre. It was further alleged he covered up his crime by forging documents to make the WJT's accounts look like they were in order.

As a result of the thefts, the WJT was forced to cancel its last production of the 2013-2014 season and shut down operations for several months.

While its future was in serious doubt, a team of volunteers with community support were able to dig out of the financial hole and move forward.

Following his exposure, Nathanson, a dual Canadian-American citizen, fled the country, resettling in Texas, where he has family. He was arrested in March when he returned to Winnipeg to see his children.

In court, Nathanson, 49, admitted to stealing $65,000 from the non-profit WJT. According to a Sept. 3 report in the Winnipeg Free Press, Crown attorney Peter Edgett described how Nathanson had authority over all financial matters, including signing cheques, payroll and financial statements. Over the course of nearly seven years, he began using theatre credit and debit cards to make personal purchases, which he then covered up in financial statements. He also made bank withdrawals that were also hidden.

His embezzlement was exposed when several cheques to actors began to bounce. He reportedly blamed depression, the collapse of his marriage and related financial issues for his actions.

His lawyer, Richard Wolson, told the court his client is undergoing counselling and is" "trying to give back to the community and help others. He is absolutely remorseful," the Free Press reported.

Nathanson reportedly made a tearful apology to the theatre, former co-workers and his family and friends. He was given a one-year conditional sentence after pleading guilty to uttering forged documents. He also presented a cheque for $65,000 of the missing money, which the board says is only partial restitution.

Nathanson's conditional sentence includes a nightly curfew of 9 p.m. and an order to abstain from drugs and alcohol. ■

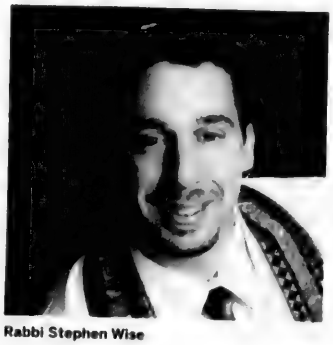
Jews, Christians, Muslims set to help refugee family

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca



Rabbi Stephen Wise

Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville, Ont., is joining with local Christians and Muslims to sponsor a family of seven who fled war in Syria and are living in Jordan.

Rabbi Stephen Wise said the partnership is unprecedented in Canada and is a moral response to a crisis situation.

"We know this is an immense task, but we cannot stand by and do nothing," he said.

"All three faiths know it is our obligation to help the needy, one family at a time. We felt this was a unique situation, that [we all] sponsor refugees. We feel this would set an example for other partnerships like this. These are people who need help. It doesn't matter what ethnicity or religion they are."

Rabbi Wise was planning to make a pitch for his congregation's support during the first day of Rosh Hashanah. The three faith groups have agreed to raise more than $30,000 to support the family once they're in Canada. One of them, Maple Grove United Church, is preparing the paperwork to facilitate the family's emigration. The other participant is Canadians in Support of Refugees in Dire Need (CSRDN).

Sandra Onufryk, chair of the church's outreach committee, said the United Church is a sponsorship agreement holder, allowing it to bring refugees to Canada who have been approved by federal authorities. It could take as long as 17 months before the family arrives. The vetting process is extensive, including medical, criminal and terrorist checks, she said, adding the process could be expedited.

Onufryk said the idea for a partnership originated with Aliya Khan, co-founder of CSRDN, and Rev. Morar Murray-Hayes, the presiding minister at Maple Grove. They thought it would "show the world that the three Abrahamic religions could work together in a constructive way," she said.

In meetings with refugee advocacy groups at the ISNA Canada (Islamic Society of North America) mosque in Mississauga, which will host a rally for Syrian refugees Oct. 25, Onufryk learned of the Syrian family now living in Jordan. The family has relatives in Canada who asked for help in bringing them over.

Onufryk said getting Muslims, Christians and Jews to co-operate to help the family "shows that the three faith groups, which had conflict in the past, can work together in Canada to help needy people."

Their partnership has prompted inquiries from others, she added. Representatives of two Catholic churches called on her for more information within a 24-hour span last week, as has a citizens group, which can also sponsor refugees, she said.

Several Toronto shuls are also taking steps separately to support refugee families, including Beth Tikvah Congregation, City Shul and Congregation Darchei Noam. As well, Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal and Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa are planning to do the same.

Despite statements of co-operation between CSRDN, Maple Grove Church and Shaarei-Beth El, an issue cropped up that gave the church and synagogue pause before agreeing to participate in the rally at the ISNA Canada mosque. South of the border in 2007, ISNA was named an unindicted co-conspirator in the Holy Land Foundation case after being linked to efforts to funnel money to Hamas.

As well, two years ago, the Canada Revenue Agency removed the charitable status of ISNA Development Foundation, saying, "The government of Canada... will not tolerate the abuse of the registration system for charities to provide any means of support to terrorism."

Rabbi Wise acknowledged ISNA's U.S. link. "It's a tricky one," he said. "We might not agree with ISNA on everything. I wouldn't partner with organizations that call for the destruction of Israel and support terrorism."

But he knew Khan from their joint participation in the Interfaith Council of Halton. "I feel this kind of issue, helping refugees, can bring us together, rather than drive us apart," he said.

Onufryk said she, too, was "concerned" about the ISNA connection and discussed it with her church colleagues. "We decided the needs of the family in Jordan were... greater than our concerns."

Asked about the mosque's ties to ISNA in the United States, Khan said CSRDN is the sponsoring group. "CSRDN is a Muslim organization with multifaith representation. "We meet at ISNA," she said. ■

Temple Sinai Slichot service mixes drama and prayer

JODIE SHUPAC

Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto held a unique Slichot service on Sept. 5 that Rabbi Michael Dolgin, the Reform synagogue's senior rabbi, said can be categorized as "neither show nor shul."

As part of a larger effort to challenge people's assumptions about prayer, Temple Sinai created an innovative Slichot – the series of penitential prayers and liturgy typically begun on the Saturday night preceding Rosh Hashanah and read each night until Yom Kippur – by fusing traditional Jewish writings with Jewish theatrical texts and traditional synagogue music with music one would find in a Jewish theatre production.

"We want to let go of the idea that religion and culture are separate things," Rabbi Dolgin said.

This merging of modern drama and music with standard liturgy was first piloted at Temple Sinai's Slichot service last year, in partnership with the professional, non-profit Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company.

Temple Sinai has had a partnership with the theatre for over five years.

This year, Rabbi Dolgin and Temple Sinai's Cantor Charles Osborne created a fresh program along with Harold Green's co-artistic directors David Eisner (also a member of Temple Sinai) and Avery Saltzman.

The service was held at the Toronto Centre for the Arts and drew a crowd of over 700 people.

Described by Rabbi Dolgin as "a combination of the kind of talents you usually expect from clergy mixed with those you usually expect from theatre performers," the evening featured two cantors –Osborne and the shul's other cantor, Katie Oringel – Rabbi Dolgin and Temple Sinai's Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg, plus four professional actors, three professional singers and a 10-piece orchestra arranged through the Harold Green Theatre.

In addition to traditional liturgy sung or recited responsively by clergy and audience members, the program included a dramatic telling of the story of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, a rendition of Bette Midler's song From a Distance, a scene from Rich Orloff's play Can This Marriage be Saved, about an imagined divorce between God and humanity, and an improvised skit performed by Canadian actor and comedian couple Colin Mochrie and Debra McGrath.

"The idea is that each [element] informed the other. The traditional liturgy gave grounding and roots to the modern cultural elements, and the latter opened up the liturgy and made it accessible," Rabbi Dolgin explained.

He added that the purpose of the night was to give congregants or any interested members of the Jewish community a "chance to prepare for the holidays in a way we believed would be more accessible to people who wouldn't attend shul with regularity," other than on the High Holidays.

Congregational participation was encouraged, and attendees were given prayers to recite in unison throughout the performance.

Temple Sinai has taken this new approach to prayer as a way of appealing to congregants who aren't comfortable with normative services or are looking for different ways to get meaning and spiritual connection from a synagogue experience.

Rabbi Dolgin said the synagogue certainly won't be dispensing with conventional prayer services, but noted that the shul is hoping to work toward enriching other services, like those held on Shabbat and other holidays, with this "new kind of Jewish communal prayer… this mixture of traditional liturgy, teaching and cultural and musical pieces."

He acknowledged that many congregants still want traditional services, but "a lot of people are hungry for [other kinds of] spiritual experiences… We hope the collaboration with the theatre company can help provide that."

Temple Sinai has been asked to share its new approach to prayer at the Union for Reform Judaism's biennial convention to be held in Florida this November.

There, Rabbi Dolgin and other Temple Sinai staff will demonstrate before the several thousand convention delegates a prayer service that combines contemporary Jewish drama and ancient Jewish tradition. ■

UJA campaign already at $30 million, kickoff event told

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Steve Martin JEN ARRON PHOTOGRAPHS PHOTO

The 2016 campaign for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has raised $30 million so far, organizers said at the campaign launch.

The announcement received applause from the crowd of more than 2,200 who attended the annual event. This year's edition, held Sept. 10 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, included a bit of everything: veteran comedian Steve Martin headlining the evening, author Douglas Murray contributing Middle East analysis, and a parade of federation lay leaders exploring the meaning of it all. Julie Albert and Stephen Libin co-chaired the campaign launch.

Last year's core campaign raised $56.1 million, Steven Shulman, campaign director and counsel at federation, said in a post-event interview, and supplemental gifts increased the total to more than $60 million. No target has been set for this year, aside from eclipsing last year's result.

The launch coincided with the recent release of federation's strategic plan, which adopted aggressive five-year targets for the city with North America's third-largest federated campaign. "We want to grow the campaign by one-third," said Shulman, "because we feel that reflects what we have in Toronto and the role that Toronto needs to play in federation in the Jewish world."

The increase, he said, will depend on two groups.

"It can be done by growing the number of donors and by those who are already giving gifts understanding the pivotal nature of this organization in the community" and donating commensurately.

One surprising result from preparing the plan, officials said, was a lack of awareness about federation's local contributions.

"One important fact we discovered through these consultations," said Morris Perlis, chair of federation's board, "was that too many people had no idea of UJA's full width and breadth throughout our community and across Israel, and what we do on a daily basis to ensure that Jewish Toronto continues to be a leader among Diaspora communities."

Speakers highlighted the multiple causes that benefit from UJA funds. Felicia Posluns, co-chair of the 2016 campaign, highlighted Jewish Family & Child and other social service agencies, such as Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, which helped her father and other survivors begin new lives after the Shoah.

Shoel Silver, the second campaign co-chair, emphasized overseas efforts, including federation's beneficiaries in Israel, such as an Ethiopian woman who will soon graduate from nursing school courtesy of a federation scholarship, and the city of Sderot, which has absorbed years of rocket attacks from nearby Gaza.

And Ruth Ekstein, chair of UJA 2016 Women's Philanthropy, emphasized local groups that fortify Jewish identity, from Jewish day schools, to Hillel and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, to the PJ Library.

But it was comedy's Renaissance man, the final performer, who occupied the night's spotlight. Spurred by a question-and-answer session with sportscaster Elliotte Friedman, Martin's trademark combination of goofiness and sophisticated one-liners delighted the audience.

At one point, while considering the comedic influence of Jews in Hollywood, he asked rhetorically: "Who's funnier than Mel Brooks?" Friedman, playing the straight man, answered, "Nobody." Martin's mock offence triggered gales of laughter.

Martin's hour-long appearance also showcased some of his non-comedic pursuits. He played the banjo for about 10 minutes and even answered two questions from the audience on the subject. He also discussed Group of Seven painter Lawren Harris and the exhibit of the Canadian's works that he is curating. It will visit the Art Gallery of Ontario after an American tour beginning in October.

British journalist Murray's remarks proved more sobering. The associate director of the Henry Jackson Society, a think-tank, lamented that Israel has become a partisan issue in many countries. He also worried the recent P5+1 agreement with Iran won't thwart Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

"As part of his defence of the [agreement], [U.S.] President [Barack] Obama has claimed that in the event that Iran were to breach the agreement, mechanism will be in place that would trigger the immediate return of sanctions: a sanctions snapback," Murray said. "But in reality, the procedures set out mean that at best, restoring sanctions would take a number of months, and there is no guarantee that this move might not meet with opposition from key international powers." ■

Liberal Bendayan takes on NDP leader in Outremont

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

If Rachel Bendayan doesn't slay the giant, it won't be for lack of trying.

The 35-year-old lawyer has knocked on 10,000 doors to date, she says, in an effort to return Outremont to the Liberal stronghold it was for decades.

That giant is New Democratic Party leader Tom Mulcair, who has represented the riding since a 2007 byelection and garnered 55 per cent of the vote in 2011, leaving the then Liberal hopeful trailing at 21 per cent.

Bendayan is unbowed. The overriding impression she has from showing up at people's homes in this sprawling, culturally and economically diverse riding is that people want change. "The reaction has been fantastic. I'm very encouraged," she said. "I think it's really important to hear from the constituents I will represent."

Bendayan has been unofficially campaigning since her unopposed nomination in March 2014. She opened her office last June, well before the earlier-than-expected Aug. 2 election call, on Park Avenue, near St. Viateur Street, in the heart of a bustling multicultural microcosm.

Since Jan. 1, she's been on an unpaid sabbatical from law firm Norton Rose Fulbright Canada, where she's practised commercial litigation and international arbitration since 2007 – a mostly male sphere, she noted.

One of the partners is former Tory prime minister Brian Mulroney. "He is supportive of me as a candidate, and thinks a new generation, fresh blood, new ideas are needed. He loves to hear stories from the hustings."

One of her mentors, outgoing Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, also encouraged her to enter the political arena, believing it's time for young people to step up.

As well as the upscale borough of the same name, Outremont encompasses parts of Mile End, Côte des Neiges and downtown Montreal. It has a sizable Jewish population, notably several chassidic and other haredi communities. The riding was her home for eight years until the electoral map was redrawn for this election and she and husband Daniel Hofmann found themselves two blocks outside its boundaries. She grew up in Côte des Neiges.

Mulcair has been noticeably absent in the riding, said Bendayan, who would welcome a debate with him, but so far he's refused.

Despite the challenge, Bendayan said she never considered running anywhere else, although she thought it would be later because she is still building her legal career.

Rachel Bendayan takes part in a "reverse town hall meeting" with MP Irwin Cotler.

She's been active in politics since her law student days at McGill University and, over the past 12 years, in federal politics, including serving on the Liberal party's legal commission and the national board of directors.

She attributes her interest in public life in part to her having been active in the B'nai Brith Youth Organization as a teen – she rose to eastern Canadian president – and, more recently, with the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, a non-partisan group that urges Jews to be active in politics.

The issues raised by residents in the different parts in the riding are often similar, Bendayan says. The most common concerns are the economy and immigration.

She is trying to do politics differently by being more consultative. A campaign is the time to discuss real issues with voters, she believes. In late August, with Cotler, she organized a "reverse town hall" meeting where she invited representatives of several cultural communities to discuss what's on their mind regarding immigration.

Among those on the panel were Max Leiberman of the Jewish community and Mazen Houdeib of the Arab community. Both find immigration too long and complicated, and the citizenship exam in Montreal is only offered on Saturdays, a sore point for Chassidim and other Orthodox Jews.

"The Harper government's immigration policies have led us away from Canada's basic values of openness and has devalued citizenship," said Bendayan, whose parents were born in Morocco.

"Wait times are such that thousands of families have no real hope of being reunited. Added fees mean many cannot afford to immigrate. A lack of service and flexibility has meant certain communities have been shut out of the immigration process altogether," she said. ■

Mount Royal Liberal hopeful gets prominent local backing

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Liberal Anthony Housefather's bid to become the next MP for Mount Royal has received a major boost, with ringing endorsements from the dean of Montreal city council, Marvin Rotrand, as well as former D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman and Russell Copeman, borough mayor of Côte des Neiges-Notre Dame de Grâce.

A broad spectrum of cultural community, municipal and public school representatives were also on hand to give their support to Housefather at the official opening of his campaign office Sept. 9.

Rotrand, who has represented the Snowdon district for 33 years, said Housefather is "honest, dedicated, competent, progressive – wonderful traits that speak to his potential to fill those big shoes left by [retiring MP] Irwin Cotler."

Rotrand read out the names of a long list of people from the Filipino, Caribbean, Bangladeshi, Sri Lankan, Chinese, Armenian, Muslim and other communities who are endorsing Housefather. From the Jewish community, he cited Aline Malka of the Sephardi community; Lubavitch Rabbi Mendy Zirkind; David Lisbona, associated with B'nai Brith; and Sid Kronish, president of the Côte St. Luc Senior Men's Club.

Housefather's campaign office is in Côte des Neiges, a highly multicultural area, and gives Housefather visibility outside his natural base in Côte St. Luc and Hampstead.

Housefather, who has been Côte St. Luc mayor for 10 years, also has the backing of English Montreal School Board chair Angela Mancini and all eight Côte St. Luc city councillors, as well as others from Hampstead and Town of Mount Royal.

Rotrand praised Housefather for having rallied a multicultural network around him that reflects the diversity of the riding, and of Canada itself.

Rotrand stressed that a longstanding bond exists between ethnic groups and the Liberal Party because of its traditional support for multiculturalism.

"It was [former prime minister] Pierre Trudeau [Mount Royal's MP for 20 years] who was against the discriminatory law on people of colour immigrating," Rotrand said, to wild cheers.

"The difference between my campaign and that of my opponents in this riding, is that they are trying to get the support of one community," Housefather said.

"We are working for the support of every community."

This was an apparent reference mainly to Conservative candidate Robert Libman, who has been emphasizing Prime Minister Stephen Harper's "unequivocal" support for Israel in his campaign.

New Democratic candidate Mario Jacinto Rimbao, who is prominent in the Filipino community, was campaigning a block away outside the Plamondon metro station, along with Jimmy Gutman, president of the Mount Royal NDP riding association.

Libman was at a seniors' residence delivering Rosh Hashanah food baskets, prepared at the Mada Community Centre.

Bergman, who served 20 years in the National Assembly, called Housefather "a man of honour and great integrity, tremendous competence and disciplined in his work... He loves all Canadians, whether they were born here or chose to come to our shores, no matter their colour, creed, religion or country of origin."

Bergman said he "will work hard to get my friends and family to vote for him, too."

It was recalled that Housefather fought more than a decade ago for the de-merger of Côte St. Luc, Hampstead and Montreal West from the new island-wide city, while Libman, then Côte St. Luc mayor, was castigated for reneging on his promise to support de-merger. "He ran to get elected on that promise and did the exact opposite," said Housefather.

Housefather also invoked the name of the elder Trudeau for championing the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, and noted that he himself had spent his public career fighting for minority rights.

"Immigration is a richness, not something to be afraid of," said Housefather. ■

CAMPAIGN NOTEBOOK

Refugees: a Jewish issue comes to the fore

Daniel Wolgelerenter

A quintessentially Jewish issue has dominated the news and become a prominent election issue ever since the picture of three-year-old Alan Kurdi lying dead in the Mediterranean surf generated headlines worldwide earlier this month.

For many, the painful image has crystallized the ongoing question of what the world ought to be doing about the human fallout from Syria's bloody civil war, which so far has killed 250,000 people and created a staggering four million refugees.

It may be the Conservatives' misfortune the photo has galvanized Canadians in the midst of an election campaign, and they've been caught flatfooted on terrain that's traditionally been friendlier to their rivals. Both the Liberals and the NDP have called for Canada to quickly admit thousands more refugees, despite criticism that this won't solve the problem and comes with security risks if they can't be properly vetted.

This story is almost as central to the Canadians psyche as it is to the Jewish one, since many of us have come here fleeing persecution, poverty or both.

We Jews feel the issue in our bones. We were born a nation of refugees, as the Passover Exodus story attests, and our history is one of both wandering and exile. Whether it's been at the hands of Babylonian soldiers, Roman centurions, Spanish Inquisitors or Nazi storm troopers, we know what it means to be uprooted.

Many Canadian Jews have an intensely personal connection to the issue, being Holocaust survivors or children of survivors, or having lost family members in the Shoah less than 75 years ago. We also have a collective memory of Canada's "none is too many" Jewish immigration policy of the time, and of the MS St. Louis being turned away from our shores, only to return to Europe, where more than a quarter of its 937 Jewish passengers perished in the Holocaust.

It's therefore no surprise synagogues are doing their part in response to the Syrian crisis.

Even before the issue became daily news, Congregation Darchei Noam in Toronto pledged to sponsor a Kurdish Syrian family's immigration to Canada. And since the problem took on greater urgency, the City Shul and Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto have decided to do the same, while Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville, Ont., has publicized its efforts – begun last April in partnership with a local mosque and a church – to sponsor a Syrian family.

On the policy front, the Jewish Refugee Action Network (JRAN), established in 2013, has been critical of the government's changes to refugee law, which it says, "place [them] at risk and disrupt Canada's humanitarian values and traditions." Founder Arthur Bielfeld, rabbi emeritus of Toronto's Temple Emanu-El, says JRAN is "rooted in… the ancient [Jewish] summons to welcome the stranger."

The group made some initial waves when it decried new federal measures that limit refugees' access to free health care and designate certain jurisdictions as "safe countries," which, by definition, don't generate refugees, a move that particularly affected Roma being persecuted in Hungary.

Until now, JRAN's efforts have, unfortunately, had limited traction, even in the Jewish community. Its narrative has taken a back seat with mainstream Jewish groups, whose advocacy in recent years has become increasingly (and often understandably) focused on Israel, to the detriment of other priorities.

The image of one dead toddler, however, seems to be changing the landscape.

Is there an easy answer to the problem? One has to agree with Prime Minister Stephen Harper when he says there isn't, and making partisan hay of a human tragedy is distasteful, to be sure.

But Harper's initial choked-up reaction to Alan Kurdi's death, and subsequent reassertion of his government's anti-terror bona fides isn't the kind of leadership many Canadians are seeking. A Postmedia poll released last week found roughly half disapprove of his approach and want to see a dramatic increase in refugee resettlement.

After stabilizing in the polls and despite inroads they've made with immigrant communities, the Conservatives are losing the thread of this story and appear to be suffering for it. If they don't find the narrative soon, the issue – along with a faltering economy, the Duffy scandal and 10 years in power – could irreversibly solidify an appetite for change among voters, Jews and non-Jews alike. ■

Bacterial infection costs young boy his limbs

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Last May, Ethan Faria celebrated his first birthday as a healthy, thriving child who had just taken his first steps.

Today, Ethan is fighting for his life in the ICU at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. He has had both of his legs amputated below the knee, his right hand amputated below the wrist, and all of the fingers on his left hand – except for one – amputated.

Ethan contracted a rare bacterium, Haemophilus influenza type B (Hib), the most common cause of bacterial meningitis. Hib is an infection of the cerebral and spinal cord fluids. For Ethan, it led to disseminated intravascular coagulation – a condition in which blood clots form in the body's small blood vessels, cutting off blood supply to organs – and skin necrosis.

Parents Rachel and Humberto Faria were told to prepare for the worst.

Rachel's longtime friend, Anita Evans, share a bond, as both have Israeli mothers. The friends converse together in Hebrew and have older children of the same age. Evans, who along with another long-time friend, Sara Gregory, spoke to The CJN about their friend Rachel, baby Ethan's illness, and efforts to raise funds for the family.

On July 24, Ethan developed a fever that quickly escalated. A visit to his family doctor revealed pneumonia and bronchitis.

"Ethan was immediately transferred by ambulance to Sick Kids. Within 30 minutes, his lips and fingertips turned purple, and everything started to unravel," Evans said.

"The doctors told Rachel and Humberto that they should prepare themselves: Ethan might die. If he made it through the next six hours, he had a chance, but every hour was crucial."

Ethan went into septic shock as the infection ravaged his body, and doctors pumped him with antibiotics to keep him alive.

A few days later, it was discovered the bacteria Ethan had contracted was one he had been vaccinated for.

Once the cause of severe illness, Hib cases have become rare since a vaccination to protect against it came into wide use in the mid-1980s. Vaccinated children are protected against Hib in combination vaccinations that also other cover diseases such as polio, pertussis, diphtheria and tetanus.

According to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Hib can cause severe infection, mostly in infants and children younger than five years of age, and can lead to lifelong disability and even death.

Ethan had his two-, four- and six-month vaccinations and was due for his booster shot at 18 months.

The bacterium spreads from person to person by direct contact or coughing and sneezing.

"Hib is something Ethan picked up three to five days before he took ill. Rachel wants answers. How can this happen in Canada – in Toronto – in this day and age?" Evans asked.

"Rachel doesn't want another parent to ever go through this, ever."

Ethan withstood what is hoped to be his last surgery during the first week of September, marking the fifth major surgery he has had in the last month.

"In the first exploratory surgery, the doctors removed all of his skin on his legs and his arms. By doing that, there is no skin to heal, so the last two surgeries he has gone through have been grafts – little pieces of skin from his back, his shoulders and his belly – taking the skin from that area and grafting it onto what's left of his legs and his arms with the hope it will heal and he will have skin again on that part of his body," Gregory said.

Evans and Gregory have started an online fundraising campaign for the family. Taking care of Ethan will be a full-time job, as he'll need years of therapy and rehabilitation, as well as to learn how to use prosthetics.

"We set a goal of $50,000. You can get by for a year on $20,000, so if we can raise $50,000, then we can give Rachel two to three years at home with Ethan," Gregory said.

Word has spread through social media. "People just took to the cause. I have had people reach out with personal messages and donations from as far away as Israel, Australia, Austria, the U.S. and Portugal," Gregory said. ■

BDS not a Jewish issue, it's a human rights issue: panelist

Kasim Hafeez grew up in Britain, the child of Pakistani immigrants, where he was immersed from a young age in anti-Semitism, and Israel was commonly demonized.

He made the journey from radical Islam to his current position as outreach co-ordinator for Christians United for Israel. In that capacity, he argues the case for the Jewish state before many hostile audiences on campus. He has defended Israel against the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, and from his perspective, "Israel is not just a Jewish issue. It's a human rights issue about freedom, democracy and doing what's right."

Hafeez was part of a Sept. 9 panel discussing anti-Israel rhetoric and anti-Semitism on North American university campuses, at an event sponsored by StandWithUs Canada, a non-profit pro-Israel education and advocacy group, at Wychwood Barns in Toronto.

The evening included the airing of a film, Crossing the Line 2, a documentary that looked at heated anti-Israel and anti-Semitic agitation on campus. The film highlighted troubling episodes from mostly American campuses in which anti-Israel advocacy has morphed into anti-Semitism, where opponents of the prevailing anti-Israel narrative have been bullied at public events and where Jewish students face a hostile atmosphere.

Fellow panelist Abe Haak agreed with Hafeez that the potential implications of the BDS movement far exceed its impact on the State of Israel.

In fact, said Haak, a lecturer at New York University, the BDS movement will likely have little impact on Israel itself. The country has faced and overcome far greater challenges. But French Jews are terrified. British Jews are scared. Swedish Jews can't walk safely in some city streets. And if Jews in North America ignore the problem, they may well be next, he warned.

For advocates of BDS, "the stated objective is Israel, but you are the real target," he said, adding it may not affect the current generation of Jews, but it will affect their children and grandchildren.

"This is a war," he continued. "They're out for blood, and we must defeat them, very much like the Israel Defence Forces does in the field."

Joining Hafeez and Haak as panelists were Asaf Romirowksy, executive director of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, and Zina Rakhamilova, StandWithUs Canada's campus co-ordinator. They were introduced by MC Barbara Kay, a National Post columnist. Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada, hosted the event.

Romirowsky said pro-Israel groups need to create a simple Zionist narrative, a sort of "elevator speech" that can be presented succinctly and makes the case for Israel. He suggested one that stresses the ancient Jewish connection to the land.

Rakhamilova said she has travelled the country to equip students with the tools necessary to address anti-Israel rhetoric on campus. StandWithUs has helped defeat divestment proposals on some campuses, and it employs social media to spread a "positive, pro-Israel message."

Haak, who was born in Jordan to Palestinian parents, said he has, over the course of 37 years, moved from enmity with Israel toward admiration. He said he regularly addresses campus audiences, which he described as the new battlefield.

The BDS movement "is organized. I never thought that Arabs would out-organize Jews," he quipped, adding it relies on a "semi-professional international organization" that provides media kits and even legal help. It has infiltrated various organizations "before we even woke up."

What's most remarkable is its ability to create coalitions of unlikely partners, including gay and lesbian groups, Communists and Islamic fundamentalists.

"You have to move out of the shtetl," he told the audience. "This is not only a Jewish issue... It's a world issue."

Haak advised Jews to build their own coalitions and make the case for Israel when they meet friends and colleagues.

But while he discusses the issues with a variety of people, he doesn't speak to Palestinian and Muslim audiences. "I don't think bridge-building is possible now," he said.

Hafeez, however, said, "I enjoy speaking to hostile crowds. We're not there to spread hatred, like the other side. We're not anti-anything. At the end of the day, truth and justice are on my side." ■

Rally held in support of Yazidis under attack by ISIS

More than 5,000 killed and over 7,400 young people have been abducted, forced to convert to Islam and sold as sex slaves

Renanah Goldhar, right, dressed as a Yazidi slave, stands with other demonstrators at a Toronto rally in solidarity with Yazidi victims of ISIS genocide. At left, another rallier demonstrates across the street from the U.S. Consulate. PAUL LUNGEN PHOTOS

In a display of street theatre designed to grab the attention of passersby, Renanah Goldhar donned the chador-like garb forced on Yazidi slave women and lamented the fate such women have endured at the hands of the Islamic State (ISIS).

Standing across the street from the U.S. Consulate on University Avenue in Toronto, Goldhar spoke in the first person and told the stories they are unable to tell, describing being raped, tortured and immolated at the hands of Islamic warriors fighting for ISIS.

Goldhar, a Jewish woman who said she could not sit silently while Yazidis experienced genocide, was one of several speakers to address a Sept. 9 rally in solidarity with Yazidis, a Middle Eastern people that traces its heritage back 6,700 years, and to support a rabbis' march in Washington, D.C., the same day that protested the Iran nuclear deal.

About 40 to 50 people, largely from the Jewish and Yazidi communities, took part in the rally, many carrying posters with a photo of a young Yazidi girl being sold in a market as a sex slave.

ISIS and Iran are two sides of the same coin in which Jews, Yazidis, Christians and other minorities are under attack by radical Islamists, organizers said.

After telling the story of Yazidi women forced to convert to Islam, sold into slavery and murdered, Goldhar said, "They won't get their pictures on the front pages as refugees." That was a reference to the outpouring of sympathy for a Syrian toddler, Alan Kurdi, who drowned off the coast of Turkey when the small boat he and his family were on, trying to get to Greece, capsized.

Similar frustration at the short shrift being given Yazidis was voiced by Mirza Ismail, a spokesman for the group Yezidi Human Rights Organization International. "More than 5,000 Yazidis have been killed, beheaded, slaughtered, buried alive, but the media doesn't care," he told The CJN.

"We know we don't have equal rights in the Middle East and equal rights [in] the international community, as well as the international media," he added.

Addressing the rally, Ismail said more than 7,400 young Yazidis have been abducted, forced to convert to Islam and sold as sex slaves. Others are being trained as suicide bombers, "and the international community is silent."

He called on the government of Canada and the international community to intervene by creating a protected autonomous region where Yazidis can be safe.

Steve Maman, the Montreal businessman who gained international attention as a modern-day Oskar Schindler, said he was merely "a guy from Montreal who decided to do something."

To date, he said, he has helped rescue 130 Yazidis from the hands of ISIS sympathizers.

He pointed to Morocco, the land of his birth, as a place where Jews and Muslims have lived peacefully together.

He said his Jewish, Moroccan and Canadian heritage prompted him to found CYCI – The Liberation of Christian and Yazidi Children of Iraq. He likened the situation facing Yazidis to the crisis that Jews faced 70 years ago in Europe. But today, he said, no one can say they didn't know. With instant information through social media, "there are no delays in the information. The excuses that let six million Jews die cannot be used today."

The Yazidis, he said, are being treated horribly. Referring to those killed and made into slaves, he said, "They're being treated like cattle. They're being killed every day without their souls leaving their bodies."

Maman praised Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Defence and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney for "standing for truth" and supporting the Yazidi people with $140 million in humanitarian aid.

Goldhar criticized the Jewish community for failing to adequately respond to the Yazidi crisis.

"We the Jewish People have stood by while a genocide has happened and shame on us. The heroes are young Yazidi girls who have nothing but their hearts and souls. They've said kill us, rather than succumb to ISIS. We don't have one ounce of their dignity or honour. Shame on us in the Jewish community," Goldhar said.

The rally was sponsored by Yezidi Human Rights Organization-International, the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, and Canadian Jews and Friends for Yazidis. ■

ISRAEL TENNIS C

Serving a better future for children.

2015 Maple Downs (Toronto) Exhibition
Playing for Peace

For the 3rd year running, Maple Downs Golf and Country Club welcomed a diverse and delightful team of kids from Israel this summer. The group included Christian, Jewish and Muslim Israeli children from Israel Tennis Centers in Tiberias, Jaffa, Tel Aviv and the Bedouin village of Rahat, near Beer Sheva. Keith and Sheila Alexander once again generously hosted the crowd, and the event raised close to $100K for the children in Israel. The Israel Tennis Centers Foundation family from around the world wishes a speedy and full recovery to dear friend and supporter Keith Alexander.

Shaping lifelong champions since 1976

For 39 years, the Israel Tennis Centers have worked tirelessly in support of all Israeli children through the medium of sport. Since opening the first center in Ramat Hasharon in 1976, the ITC has helped over a half million children, many of whom come from outlying development towns throughout Israel. The ITC's 14 centers stretch from Kiryat Shmona on the Lebanese border in the North to Beer Sheva bordering the Negev Desert in the South. By teaching the life skills of self-reliance, perseverance and focus, the ITC fosters sustainable values of self-esteem, character and tolerance, creating a positive imprint on the children, their families, the communities and the world for generations to come.

Newspaper exhibit a window on old Jewish Hamilton

ABIGAIL CUKIER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

An upcoming exhibit will give visitors a look at Jewish life in Hamilton in the 1930s and 1940s, showcasing artifacts from Hamilton's once-thriving Yiddish-language newspaper. The exhibit, The Jewish Voice of Hamilton, spotlights this publication and explores the dynamic life of the city through the lens of its publisher, Henry Balinson.

For Balinson's daughter, Goldie Leibman, who was collating printing jobs in her father's print shop at age five, it's a glimpse back into her childhood.

"These items have brought back a lot of very happy memories that I had forgotten. I realized this was the happiest times of our lives," she said.

"I was born during the Great Depression, and like most families, we struggled. We lived in the apartment over the printing plant, and the whole family would go downstairs and fold carefully and lick the stamps and address labels. It was really fun, and I felt very important at the time."

The exhibit, at the Rose and Phil Rosenshein Museum at Beth Jacob Synagogue, features items on display for the first time, including editions of the newspaper, photographs, family memorabilia, letterpress printing artifacts and oral history recordings, all part of the Balinson Family Archive. Advertisements for local businesses (some still active today), local politicians and appeals to aid the Red Cross war effort offer a further window into Hamilton.

"Henry Balinson wrote from the heart, reporting on the activities of the city, commenting on the impact of the war and providing a perspective many other Jewish immigrants of the time would have shared," said Wendy Schneider, co-chair of the Rose and Phil Rosenshein Museum.

"The Balinson archive is of historical interest because it provides a window into a culture that has now largely vanished and offers insights into the craft of letter-press printing."

In 1911 at age 24, Balinson immigrated to Canada from Russia, where he had worked as a typesetter. He later started the International Press on King Street West and published the Jewish Voice of Hamilton. An educated and engaged man, the newspaper served as an outlet for his opinions and observations, including his column, Mein shpatsir iber Hamilton (My stroll around Hamilton). Balinson used this space to deliver commentary on Jewish Hamilton and garnered much positive and critical feedback from readers.

Henry Balinson at his print shop in the 1930s

In addition to publishing the Jewish Voice, International Press attracted business from other organizations because of its typesetting services in languages including Russian, Ukrainian and Hungarian.

Leibman credits her mother, Sarah, with being the quiet "backbone" of the family, providing comfort, support and delicious home-cooked meals.

Leibman and her siblings Morley, Robert, Alex and Norman helped around the shop. But in 1925, Alex, who was 24 and a Canadian Air Force wireless air gunner, was killed in an air raid on the island of Malta. After this, Balinson stopped publishing the newspaper, and Morley took over the printing business.

"Publication stopped, and our whole life turned very sad. Mom and dad never recovered from it. Our whole family never recovered," said Leibman, who now lives in Toronto.

Balinson died in 1961 at age 75.

Leibman is proud to share her family's legacy with the public through this exhibit. "I didn't know the significance of the newspaper," Leibman said. "It's now a piece of history, and I was part of it."

The family-friendly official opening of The Jewish Voice of Hamilton is Sunday, Sept. 20, 10 a.m. to noon, and will feature guest speakers and children's activities.

It will run for six months and is open during synagogue office hours, with group tours by appointment. ■

Grandmother to climb Kilimanjaro for charity

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Thornhill resident Helen Silverman had been trying to do something "great," as she put it, every month in the year leading up to her 60th birthday, but she wasn't sure how to mark the milestone birthday itself, which falls Oct. 10.

When a friend suggested Silverman join her in October on a charity climb of Mt. Kilimanjaro to raise money for Jerusalem-based Shalva, the Association for Mentally and Physically Disabled Children in Israel, Silverman, a mother of three and grandmother of three, thought it was the perfect fit.

Though her friend ended up having to back out of the trip, Silverman remained determined to go.

"It's a way to celebrate my health in fitness in the process of taking care of others... It's going to be a challenge, but it's one I've chosen for myself. If I have a fraction of the drive and spirit of the kids [that Shalva helps], I'll be able to do it," Silverman said enthusiastically.

On Oct. 18, she'll join a team of about 30 Jews primarily from the United Kingdom and Israel on the eight-day, 5,895-metre trek up to the mountain's summit. Each participant has committed to raising a minimum of the equivalent of $10,000 (Cdn) for Shalva, which provides care and services to more than 500 children and youth with disabilities regardless of ethnicity or background.

Shalva is headquartered in Jerusalem but serves people throughout Israel, explained Gaby Hirsch, chief executive of British Friends of Shalva and the climb's co-ordinator.

Hirsch said Shalva is in the process of building a new $47-million (US) national centre in Jerusalem that will be a place for infants, children and young adults with special needs to receive treatment and access educational and recreational opportunities.

She noted she initially thought the trek, the first of its kind for Shalva, would only be attended by people from the United Kingdom, but word spread, and the group of participants is now largely split between Israelis and Brits, plus a few Canadians.

Silverman said she's raised half of the targeted amount so far from individual donors and will soon begin asking companies for support.

"I've been telling my friends I don't want birthday cards or for them take me out for lunch for my birthday. If they want to celebrate me, [sponsoring my climb] is the way to do it," she said.

Though she's always been active, Silverman knows the climb will require serious endurance, and that reduced oxygen levels caused by high altitudes will likely be a challenge.

She described her training regimen so far as fairly "eclectic."

To break in her hiking boots, she's been wearing them on excursions to the grocery store, or out for a walk and in addition to doing some running, she's been practising yoga five days a week as way to "get into the right headspace" for the trek.

"People say it's a mental challenge as much as it is a physical challenge. Yoga also helps with flexibility, and I'll be sleeping on the ground in a tent for eight nights. Plus, there are no toilets, so I've got to practice my squat," Silverman laughed.

As far as she knows, she's going to be the oldest woman on the trip, but not the oldest person: she has heard that a 69-year-old man is participating.

"I'm used to be the oldest woman doing things," Silverman mused.

She said that while her family and friends are extremely proud of her, none wanted to join her on the trek.

Still, she enthused: "It's kind of cool when you go and do something like this and don't know a soul. It really lets you connect in a way you otherwise wouldn't." ■

Event raises funds for film on Montreal art dealer

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In 2008, a U.S. court ordered the return of the 19th-century painting The Girl from the Sabine Mountains to its rightful owner: the estate of the prominent Montreal art dealer, Max Stern.

The German-born Stern had been a successful art dealer in Dusseldorf, but the Nazis forced him to close his gallery in 1937. He ended up selling some 200 European masterpieces at bargain prices.

The Girl from the Sabine Mountains, by Franz Xaver Winterhalter, is one of those paintings. Its restitution set a precedent for other claimants of stolen art, because the court equated the forced liquidation of the paintings to theft, according to Willi Korte, a German-born, American art crimes investigator dedicated to finding art looted by the Third Reich.

Korte was instrumental in retrieving the Winterhalter work. He and Clarence Epstein, head of the Max Stern Art Restitution Project (MSARP), were guest speakers at an intimate reception for the project held Sept. 3 by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU) at the Toronto home of Peter Cavanagh and Andrea Wood. Fifty people attended.

Hebrew U, along with Concordia and McGill universities in Montreal, are the beneficiaries of the Max Stern estate. Stern, who died in 1987 with no immediate heirs, settled in Montreal after World War II and, as owner of the Dominion Gallery, became one of Canada's most important art dealers and collectors.

Epstein, senior director of urban and cultural affairs at Concordia, and Korte, a lawyer and historian, are featured in the documentary, Stolen, which follows Stern's rise from war refugee to Canadian art luminary. The film also uncovers his early life history in Dusseldorf, which he kept secret, and the contemporary search for his lost masterpieces.

The recent CFHU event was an opportunity to enlighten people about the murky world of plundered art and to interest potential donors in funding Stolen so it can be completed. The film, an initiative of the MSARP, CFHU and Concordia, will benefit Hebrew U and the Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism.

Stolen is directed by Phyllis Ellis and produced by Henry Less of HLP+Partners. Sissy Federer, Andrea Wood, Susan McArthur and Robin Turack are the executive producers and project fundraisers.

Korte, known as the "Indiana Jones of the art world" regaled his audience with stories from his years of sleuthing. In his early career as a Nazi war crimes investigator, he gained expertise in archival research.

He worked closely with the World Jewish Congress in investigating Holocaust-era assets held illegally in Swiss banks, and exposing the Nazi war record of Kurt Waldheim, former Austrian president and secretary general of the United Nations.

Korte's foray into stolen art began in the early1990s with the recovery of the Quedlinburg treasures, jewelled religious objects and Christian manuscripts worth an estimated $250 million (US). They had been taken from a cave during World War II.

By examining military records, Korte discovered the cave had been guarded by U.S. forces when the priceless objects disappeared. He eventually named an American culprit.

Korte said he used these same skills to locate Stern's missing art when he began working with the MSARP in 2002.

He learned that Stern had lived in Dusseldorf, a city where the Gestapo had kept thorough files on its residents. Records from the cultural authorities pointed to "a narrative of persecution," Korte said.

"In late August of 1935, a letter indicated that Max was not qualified to own a gallery, because he was not Aryan. He was told to liquidate the gallery in 1937."

Korte said U.S. courts are very supportive, but his mission is more challenging in Europe. When Korte found a Stern painting in Italy, the gallery refused to relinquish the work. Ironically, the painting appeared at a recent exhibition in the United States, where it is being held until the dispute over ownership is litigated.

The Girl from the Sabine Mountains, one of the 12 paintings recovered from Stern's 1937 collection, showed up at a small auction house in Rhode Island. An MSARP researcher noticed the sale of the painting through a link with eBay, Korte recounted. "When we spotted the painting we made a claim." ■

Yom Kippur: what a 25-hour fast does to your body

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Those who fast on Yom Kippur are familiar with the discomfort associated with depriving themselves of food and drink – to say nothing of a nice, hot shower – especially during the last leg of the 25-hour fast.

Marni Wasserman, a certified natural chef and a culinary holistic nutritionist, spoke to The CJN about the effects that a 25-hour fast can have on a typical healthy adult.

She says the first eight to 10 hours should pass without any physical discomfort. "They'll go to sleep, wake up, but then, normally, people's bodies are gearing up for breakfast or coffee or whatever their morning routine is."

That's when the problems start.

Let's take a closer look at how different parts of the body react to going a full day without food and water.

Head: As the day progresses, you might start to feel dizzy, light-headed, and lethargic. A lot of that comes at the end of the day, right before dinner is usually eaten. "Headaches can also be a big part of it, depending on what's usually in your diet," Wasserman says. "For sure, a coffee drinker is going to feel that. There will be a drop in blood pressure. You'll be foggy."

Muscles: "Your muscles are going to start breaking down glucose and start using that for energy," she says, "but you're not going to atrophy or lose muscle mass in 25 hours."

Stomach: How you eat on Erev Yom Kippur can play a role in how you'll feel during the fast, Wasserman warns.

"People tend to overeat. I would be cautious of this," she says. "No one wants to be bloated or uncomfortable. Eating too much of heavy foods like meats and desserts wouldn't be recommended the night before."

She adds: "I would keep it lighter, easier to digest, still well-rounded and balanced, but more carb-heavy, because your body is going to use mostly carbohydrates for energy the next day. That's a free pass to eat lots of carbs."

Overall, she says, "your stomach will shrink a little. You might feel a little acidy, have acid reflux or just feel tightness and maybe a little internal pressure.

Eyes: "If a person is really dehydrated – if they did not drink enough the day before the fast – they can definitely get dizzy and light-headed, to a point that it can affect their vision," Wasserman says.

Heart: Fasting can slow down your heart rate, Wasserman notes. "In some cases, it can speed it up if people get anxious about the fact that they're not eating. But typically, blood pressure is going to drop a little and it's going to slow things down a bit."

Extremities: "When you're not eating, you've got nothing to burn, so you may feel colder in your extremities – your hands, your feet – they're probably going to feel colder," Wasserman says. "Depending on how much a person's blood sugar has dropped, they can also start to feel some numbness, and they can get the shakes."

Who ought to be a Jew?

Michael Diamond

In a recent edition of The CJN, Rabbi Dow Marmur shared the evolution of his thinking regarding the acceptance of patrilineal descent as a means to define who is a Jew.

A letter writer named Ezra Franken disagreed with Rabbi Marmur, suggesting it would be "fairer" if we all adhered to the "universally accepted" determination of matrilineal descent.

The truth is, matrilineal descent is not "universally accepted," given that most of the Reform world, and many in the secular world, accept patrilineal descent. And there's good reason for that: intermarriage rates in the United States are skyrocketing and on a trajectory to rise even higher. Canada isn't far behind.

Ultimately, the debate over who is a Jew is both a challenge and an opportunity. The challenge is to maintain as Jews as many of the children of intermarriages as possible. The opportunity is to welcome into our "tribe" as many Jews by choice as possible through conversion. And there are several related issues, too, including the question of conversions performed by non-Orthodox rabbis, the validity of which are not currently accepted by the Orthodox world.

One of the beautiful things about Judaism is our ability to facilitate – indeed, encourage – free and critical thinking. Leaving aside the great value of that attribute in our daily lives, it has also spawned multiple approaches to "being Jewish" in the Diaspora.

Some would argue that by offering choice, we have diluted the religion and weakened the global Jewish community. I would argue, however, that by offering choice, we have encouraged millions to remain Jewish in a secular world that would otherwise have swallowed up a majority of Diaspora Jewry.

You need only look to Israel, where the ranks of the secular have grown dramatically, to see the impact of minimal choice when it comes to worship. There, it's a problem, but not an existential one, because all Israelis wake up every day in a Jewish state. But in a secular Diaspora, that lack of choice in how one chooses to "be Jewish" could lead to a dramatic reduction in the number of people who identify as Jewish, support Jewish causes and advocate for Israel.

There's no doubt in my mind that the impact of these "Who is a Jew" questions is potentially catastrophic to the unity of the Jewish People. Marriages of Jews to non-Jews or to Jews who have converted outside the Orthodox rabbinate are going to not only continue, but grow in number. To the extent that a significant and important part of the Jewish world excludes children of Jewish fathers from "the tribe," and to the extent that Orthodox rabbis, with the presumed support of their congregations, continue to refuse to recognize the validity of conversions conducted by non-Orthodox rabbis, we are going to seriously challenge the fabric of our global Jewish community.

Two examples to make the point: if I'm a male Jew, identify as a Jew, practise Judaism and raise my child as a Jew, do we not want my child to be accepted as a Jew in order to add one more to our tiny community? And if not, how am I to respond to my Orthodox fellow Jews who reject my own offspring?

Similarly, if I, a male Jew, have chosen to marry a woman who is a Jew by choice, properly converted by a non-Orthodox rabbi, and we build a Jewish home and raise our children as Jews, how are we and our friends and family going to react if our children are not accepted as being Jewish by that same important segment of the Jewish world?

I am worried. We are in the middle stages of a simmering conflict that will either split the Jewish world or help to unite us. In the end, only the ability of the Orthodox world to recognize this, and to modify its thinking, will save us. ■

Shuls may need to look at alternate income sources

Vancouver's Congregation Beth Israel has done this for years, suggesting members donate two per cent of their pre-tax income, with a ceiling of $4,800, says executive director Shannon Etkin. While some synagogues ask for verification of incomes, Beth Israel does not.

"We're trying to be welcome and open to people if they want to be part of this congregation. Finances shouldn't be a part of that," he said.

Other synagogues are investigating what they call a sustaining or voluntary model. The synagogue calculates its annual budget, figures out the per capita cost to members and then suggests they pay that amount.

The beauty is that not only does it lead to greater transparency about synagogue finances, it also gives potential members the flexibility they need without the embarrassment of pleading their case before a committee. The overwhelming fear, of course, is that not enough money will be raised.

So far, Mael says, the few North American synagogues that have tried this have brought in about the same revenues as with the traditional model. In some cases, nervous administrators and presidents have asked a few deep-pocketed members to guarantee that if not enough is raised, they will make up the difference.

Toronto's Beth David Synagogue has embarked on a hybrid approach, said president Barry Levine. In addition to its regular fees of $2,200 for a family, last year it told members that the full cost of running the Conservative shul is $2,900 per family and let them choose which amount to pay.

Last year, 31 families paid the higher amount, and Levine expects that with some promotion of the new undertaking, more will do so this year.

"This is based upon pulling on people's heartstrings as opposed to making a business case. You don't get more, it's about the 'why' – why you belong to the shul," Levine said.

Then there are shuls that have no dues at all, although they may charge for High Holiday tickets. Chabad congregations are well known for not charging dues, preferring instead to empower their rabbis to aggressively fundraise to support themselves and their communities. However, in areas where the Jewish community is well established, individual rabbis may act differently, said Rabbi Levi Gansburg, who runs the Chabad congregation in Toronto's affluent York Mills neighbourhood.

"Most Chabads do not have dues, but in cities where it's customary to have dues, they put it out there," he said.

Rabbi Aaron Levy, founding director and rabbi of Makom in downtown Toronto

Rabbi Gansburg did not take a salary for two years while he established himself. Now, about half the 600 or so people in his synagogue pay a membership fee, a move that was suggested by congregants who were accustomed to paying dues at other synagogues and preferred to pay once a year rather than have the rabbi "knocking at their door," Rabbi Gansburg said.

Others give more, but don't want a membership, while many young professionals want to be involved but don't want to pay traditional dues, he said.

"We cannot think we're going to attract the next generation of people and [run a shul like] a business," Rabbi Gansburg said. "At the end of the day, the rabbi has to take responsibility for the community. The rabbi says our primary concern is the next generation, and we will make it work."

In other words, Chabad's model requires rabbis to build relationships, so that ultimately, patrons will write a cheque.

"It takes a tremendous commitment of time and energy," Mael said of this option, and it likely isn't optimal for most synagogues.

On the other end of the spectrum, Makom, an unaffiliated "grassroots community" in downtown Toronto, has not charged membership fees, instead relying on donations, program fees and grants from Canadian and American foundations.

> We operate on a shoestring budget and make the most of what we have.

Makom has a broad array of offerings, including prayers, as well as arts-based programming and environmental activism, and a membership base that ranges from secular to modern Orthodox, said Rabbi Aaron Levy.

"I should spend more time fundraising. We operate on a shoestring budget and make the most of what we have," Rabbi Levy said.

The congregation, which rents space for its programs, is considering moving to some sort of membership fee to give it a more stable funding base.

If Makom were to charge dues, it would offer a sliding scale and there would be no dreaded membership committee. "It's a really important value that everyone feels welcome, and that includes across class issues," Rabbi Levy said.

But the harsh reality is that synagogue dues generally only cover a portion of the budget – Mael estimates that it's between 50 to 60 per cent of the costs.

For many communities that find themselves trapped by dues that can go no higher, along with large and aging buildings that need maintenance and an aging membership base, the only solution is to look at endowment funds to cover the gaps.

"We've got to get away from the cycle of 'our costs are going up so we've got to raise dues by three per cent,'" Levine said. "We've got to get creative about approaching families that can pay more."

At Beth David, the synagogue has begun the conversation with members about planned giving, but "it's not a part-time gig. You need a development officer," Levine said.

Leszner says Reform congregations are also looking at legacy funds and other ways to boost the bottom line, without raising dues.

"Looking at the future, if synagogue life is going to continue, we have to look at alternative sources of income," he said. ■

Mindful of risks, Europe's Jews urge aid to refugees

CNAAN LIPSHIZ
JTA

When he looks into the tired eyes of the Syrian refugees now flooding Europe's borders, Guy Sorman is reminded of his father, Nathan, who fled Germany for France just months before Adolf Hitler came to power.

"He wanted to go to the United States. Visa declined. He tried Spain, same result. He ended up in France, neither welcome nor deported," Sorman wrote last week in an Op-Ed in Le Monde in which he argued that Europe should learn from its abandonment of the Jews during the Holocaust and accommodate the stream of migrants pouring through its borders from the war-torn Middle East.

Sorman's view is not uncommon among European Jews, many of them living in societies still grappling with a sense of collective guilt for their indifference to the Nazi genocide – or complicity in it. At a Holocaust memorial event in Paris on Sept. 6, French Chief Rabbi Haim Korsia urged Europe's leaders to match the actions of non-Jews who saved Jews from the Nazis by welcoming Syrian refugees.

Yet as many European Jews rush to the refugees' aid in word and deed, some worry that letting them stay may further contribute to the anti-Semitic violence driving Jews to leave Europe, much of it perpetrated by immigrants from the Middle East. Eager to exploit such fears, the Islamic State claimed in July that it had sent 1,000 fighters to infiltrate Europe as refugees.

"Some of these new immigrants – the Syrians and Iraqis especially – have been taught to hate Jews," Henri Gutman, president of the left-leaning Belgian Jewish cultural group CCLJ, wrote in an Op-Ed published Aug. 31 on the organization's website. "We risk further increases in anti-Semitism."

While urging "generosity" toward the refugees, Gutman said Europeans must observe "imperatives of defence" against Islamism. The Central Jewish Organization of the Netherlands, where two elderly Holocaust survivors were hospitalized recently following an assault by robbers who appeared to be Middle Eastern immigrants, spoke to a similar tension in a statement from its chairman, Ron van der Wieken.

While "aware that some Middle Eastern refugees harbour very negative feelings toward Jews ... Jews cannot withdraw support from those in need and fleeing serious violence," van der Wieken wrote. He urged Holland to devise a "charitable" refugee policy.

Such tension even exists for some of the hundreds of Jews helping the refugees on the ground in Hungary, Austria, Italy and beyond.

"As Eastern European Jews, we carry the knowledge of how it feels like to flee our homes," said Rabbi Zoltan Radnoti, the newly elected chairman of the rabbinical board of the Mazsihisz umbrella group of Hungarian Jewish communities. "Still, I help the refugees with fear that I am helping send danger to other Jews in Europe. I know some of the refugees may have fired on our [Israeli] soldiers. Others would have done so in a heartbeat. I know. But I am duty bound to help."

In Hungary, the main point of entry for a wave of refugees that authorities have only partially been able to check since its onset last month, approximately 150 Jews are involved in a relief operation mounted by local Jewish communities. Mazsihisz set up three collection depots in Budapest Jewish institutions from which it delivered approximately half a ton of food, clothes and other necessities to migrants. The community also collected $5,000 to buy diapers, medicine and water.

In Italy, the Jewish community of Milan threw open the doors of its Holocaust museum last month to accommodate homeless migrants from the Middle East and Africa.

And in Brussels, Rabbi Menachem Margolin, a Chabad rabbi and director of the European Jewish Association lobby group, is preparing to lead a delegation of rabbis this week to deliver food and non-perishables to the refugees.

Such actions are part of a wider popular reaction in Europe to the migrant problem. It's an issue that has worried immigration authorities for more than 20 years, but the wars in Syria and Iraq along with instability elsewhere in the region brought the crisis to a head last month, as tens of thousands began pouring into the European Union from Serbia.

In some cases, border guards were unable to stop the masses from crossing. In Hungary, authorities helped the masses move westward to wealthier EU countries, a policy consistent with right-wing Prime Minister Viktor Orban's claim that the migrants are "a German problem" because that's where the refugees "would like to go." The move flouts EU rules that make refugees the responsibility of the first member state they reach.

Last week, Germany vowed to absorb 500,000 refugees per year – far beyond the figure pledged by other members.

Some 340,000 people have immigrated from the Middle East into Europe in 2015 alone, according to EU figures.

Some of the volunteers were jarred into action by the image of Alan Kurdi, a Syrian boy whose body washed up on a Turkish beach on Sept. 2. Alan's father was the only member of his family who survived when its boat capsized en route from Turkey to Greece. The gruesome sight followed the discovery the previous week of 71 bodies in a truck abandoned on an Austrian highway.

But for Julia Kaldori, a Hungarian-born Jew who divides her time between Vienna and Budapest, the trigger was less shocking.

"I started seeing people convening at train stations in Budapest," said Kaldori, the editor of Wina, the monthly publication of the Jewish Community of Vienna. "I began talking to some of them, and I couldn't help becoming involved."

Kaldori says she is aware that statistically, Middle Eastern immigrants are responsible for most of the violence driving French Jews to leave in record numbers – nearly 7,000 in 2014 alone. But "when you look into their eyes, the refugee issue stops being a demographic issue," she said.

Kaldori hopes that having been helped by Jews, refugees with anti-Jewish views may reconsider. But Rabbi Radnoti says he is less hopeful. Instead, he cites the biblical story of Sodom and Gomorrah, the sinner cities that Abraham had pleaded with God to spare.

"If there are but five righteous souls in that group," Rabbi Radnoti said, "then we must do what we can to save them." ■

A Bedouin officer must work harder

Sagi Melamed

It was one of the hottest days of August. The heat and humidity had gone beyond unpleasant and become truly bad for one's health.

Betsy and I waited until evening to take a short bike ride in the fields surrounding Hoshaya. The air was still very hot. The fields that are normally busy with runners and cyclists were practically deserted.

Suddenly a young man jogged past us. Crew cut dark hair, wearing a shirt with a military insignia from which protruded a greenish plastic bag. He was sweating heavily. When I greeted him, he stopped running and began jogging in place.

"What's that garbage bag under your shirt for?" I asked.

"To wrap around my body so I sweat more."

"You want to sweat more on a day like today!" I exclaimed. "Where are you from?" I added, attempting to understand the garbage bag.

"I'm your neighbour. Bedouin. From the village Arab al-Heib. I'm an officer in the Bedouin battalion. Soon I'm going on a company commanders' course."

"Good for you!" Betsy and I chorused. I added, "But why do you make things harder for yourself with a bag under your shirt on such a hot day?"

"Because I'm a Bedouin officer," he said, still jogging in place, "and a Bedouin officer has to work harder to succeed."

The admiration on our sweaty faces grew. I asked if I could photograph him. He agreed, on condition it was from behind so he could not be identified. He then continued on his run, leaving us admiring and astonished.

Although I am unconvinced of the value of running wrapped in a garbage bag on a hot evening, to succeed as a Bedouin officer certainly does require extra work.

A Bedouin officer, over and above the difficulties facing any combat officer in the Israel Defence Forces, faces several additional challenges:

First, before army service – Bedouin youth come from communities where not everyone supports army service. Their education, language skills and acculturation tend to be below the national average, and that is before acknowledging that the "Arab enemy" the IDF is training them to fight, actually looks and sounds like them.

Second, when they get to the army – for them, Hebrew is their second language. Even in units like the Bedouin battalion, the army's language and mentality is Hebrew, and often the system is affected by prejudices and suspicion.

Third, when they go on leave – on the bus, in the mall, in a restaurant or at a movie, when a Bedouin soldier is not in uniform he looks and sounds Arab. In Israel, as painful as this is to admit, Arabs are viewed with more suspicion. Their bags are checked more carefully at the mall, they are stopped more often and questioned more.

Fourth, when they get home – not every Bedouin family supports army service for members of the Bedouin community. Depending on the village and clan, a Bedouin soldier might be viewed with admiration and respect, or with resentment and anger.

Fifth, when they complete their army service – despite increasing awareness and greater efforts by government and NGOs, there is still a great gap between what awaits newly released Jewish soldiers and their Bedouin peers.

"You're right," I silently told the anonymous Bedouin officer running off into the distance. "You do have to work harder. But you're not the first in that position. Think how hard the Jewish immigrants to Canada and United States had to work to integrate and succeed in their new societies a century ago. And see how far they've come today!"

And finally, may Israel's immigrants and minorities spend less time complaining and more time following the example of that Bedouin officer! Perhaps not to wrap themselves in plastic bags on a steamy evening, but certainly to arm themselves with determination and commitment to work harder on the way to success and integration. ■

Why Obama won nearly all Democrats on the nuclear deal

Yonah Jeremy Bob

The internal Democratic Party debate over whether or not to support the Obama administration's Iran nuclear deal has been one of the most fascinating U.S. foreign policy debates in recent memory.

The Iran nuclear deal was unofficially sealed on Sept. 8 with all 41 U.S. Senate Democrats declaring support, when only 34 were needed to carry the day if U.S. President Barack Obama and Congress disagreed.

When the deal was signed in July, the politics of whether the Democratic president could carry enough of his own party to move the deal forward were fraught with doubt. A clear majority of Americans were against the deal, and an even clearer majority of a range of members of Jewish organizations, led by AIPAC (the American Israel Public Affairs Committee), campaigned hard against the deal, reportedly spending tens of millions of dollars to pressure many "on the fence" Democrats.

Yet at this point, the party, except for a statistically insignificant number, has lined up behind Obama – including many Jewish Democratic congressmen.

Given the high level of opposition to the deal, and putting substance aside, why has Obama succeeded politically? Understanding the answer requires recognizing a key nuance in electoral psychology and threat perception.

Most obviously, those doubting the deal underestimated the fact that congressmen historically support their own party's president on signature landmark issues almost unanimously.

Many Democrats voted for Obama's landmark health-care bill despite near certainty that such a vote would finish them politically, and the Iran deal was no less a test of party loyalty.

Second, the wider American Jewish population has supported Obama's policies on Israel and the Middle East, as a function of being heavily Democratic, even as Jewish organizations have sometimes not.

But what about the wider American public's disapproval?

Right or wrong (and probably right), the political bet for supporting the deal is likely that in 14 months, in November 2016, there will be no decisive consequences and the deal will not be a decisive issue in the American presidential election, even if foreign policy unexpectedly supplants the economy and personality as decisive.

The reason goes to the psychological perception of the Iranian nuclear threat, which most of the warnings have emphasized gets more serious in eight, 10 or 15 years. In the past, the nuclear threat of the Soviet Union impacted people psychologically, maybe even more than was warranted.

More recently, some psychologists have found that many nuclear weapons threats are now "out of sight, out of mind." The average citizen's relationship with the nuclear weapons threat, from Iran or anyone else, is characterized by ignorance, denial and apathy. For some, the science of nuclear weapons, the complexity of the deal and of the two sides' arguments over it were simply too complex to follow for them to continue to care about the issue.

An interesting analogy is the American climate change debate.

For several election cycles, most Americans have believed in climate change and theoretically backed policies to push back greenhouse gases connected with climate change. But that has not forced Congress to act, largely since environmental "judgment day," like a theoretical Iran nuclear judgment day, is vague and seems years away.

When people worry about nuclear terror, it is far more connected to a variety of closer-to-home terror issues: a "dirty" suitcase bomb, biological or chemical weapons or another 9/11-style attack.

In short, even many who expect an escalated nuclear threat from the deal see it as a 2020, 2024 or 2028 election issue, certainly not 2016.

By then, many current U.S. congressmen may be gone, and for others, it may be old news.

Understanding the psychology of how far Iran's nuclear threat likely is from impacting 2016 voter behaviour, it suddenly appears surprising that there was such doubt about the vote. ■

Eight stories to watch in Israel this new year

BEN SALES
JTA, JERUSALEM

Tired of hearing about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians or the machinations of a certain Islamic Republic? There's plenty of other news happening in Israel, from uproar over the country's enormous natural gas reserves to a growing push to legalize marijuana.

Here are eight newsy items you may have missed in 5775 – and stories you should watch out for as the new year begins.

1. Israel's controversial gas drilling increases

Since the discovery of two huge offshore fields of natural gas in the Mediterranean Sea, Israel has turned from an energy importer to an exporter. Israel has signed agreements worth tens of billions of dollars to export gas to Egypt and Jordan, and in 2013, a conglomerate of two energy companies – Noble Energy and the Delek Group – began exporting gas from the Tamar natural gas field.

In June, however, an agreement to let Delek and Noble also develop the much larger Leviathan field set off protests in Israel. Critics, including the head of Israel's antitrust authority, who resigned, called the deal a monopoly.

At first, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has vowed to move ahead with the agreement, telling the Knesset in July that "we will not allow populism to bury the gas in the ground." But then Economy Minister Aryeh Deri refused to push it forward until a new antitrust commissioner is appointed. And in August, Egypt discovered its own offshore natural gas field, giving Israel some competition.

2. Will new reforms solve Israel's housing crisis?

Sure, Israelis are concerned about bombs and tunnels, but they're also worried about another threat to their ability to live in Israel: skyrocketing housing prices. Since 2008, prices have risen nearly 60 per cent. The prohibitive costs of housing were what led half a million Israelis to take to the streets in protest in 2011.

Running on a promise to address the housing crisis, the upstart centrist party Kulanu won 10 seats in the March Knesset elections. Now Kulanu's chairman, Finance Minister Moshe Kahlon, has advanced a series of reforms designed to curb prices, including raising taxes on the purchase of second homes and streamlining Israel's housing bureaucracy, making construction and contracting more efficient. Time will tell if his efforts make it easier for young Israelis to buy a home.

3. Israel becomes more French

As anti-Semitism rises in France, Israelis have been hearing more and more French on the street over the past few years. Since 2010, some 20,000 French Jews have moved to Israel, and officials predict that 2015 will end up being a second straight record year for French aliyah.

Parisians have filled the streets of Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and coastal cities like Netanya and Ashdod. Israelis already are feeling their effect; shawarma stands, for example, now offer the signature Israeli lamb dish in a baguette as well as a pita. As Israel's French community continues to grow, we'll see how else the French arrivals may shape their new home.

4. Israel grows closer to India and China

The European Union has long been Israel's top trading partner and the United States its strongest ally. Those things are unlikely to change anytime soon, but the past year has seen Israel look to the East as well as the West. India's new prime minister, Narendra Modi, wants to strengthen ties with Israel – he intends to visit the country, and will be the first Indian head of state to do so – and has had friendly words for Netanyahu.

Israel, meanwhile, is looking to increase its trade with China. In 2015, Chinese investments in Israel reached $6 billion, and Israel and China are looking to establish a free-trade zone between them.

5. The rise of the 5-shekel cafe

Israelis are fond of complaining about high prices, but one cost you won't hear them gripe about is coffee. That's because Cofix, a rapidly expanding cafe chain, sells everything on its menu – from espresso to sandwiches – for five shekels (about $1.70 Cdn). Since it launched in 2013, Cofix has opened nearly 100 branches across Israel, and has plans to open a total of 300 stores. A knockoff competitor, Cofizz, has a couple dozen branches of its own with the same five-shekel concept.

Cofix has forced older chains to lower their prices, and it's not stopping there. It's opened a handful of bars where everything goes for five shekels, and just opened a couple branches of Super Cofix, a dollar store-style supermarket with the same prices.

6. Haredim join the workforce

With haredi Orthodox political parties back in the governing coalition, haredi men are unlikely to be included in Israel's draft. But haredim have been integrating into mainstream Israeli society another way: through the workforce.

According to recent data from Israel's Economy Ministry, 16 per cent of Israeli businesses now employ haredim, up from eight per cent in 2008. The number of haredi employees in the business sector also doubled, from 48,000 in 2008 to more than 100,000 now.

But haredi-secular relations still have a long way to go. A recent survey found that 45 per cent of haredim had no interaction at all with secular Jews.

7. Marijuana legalization gets closer

Israeli cannabis growers are hoping to make the desert bloom. Medical marijuana is already legal in Israel, and Israel's deputy health minister announced new regulations in July that will allow cannabis to be sold in pharmacies and prescribed by a wider range of doctors.

In the past few years, leaders of Israeli political parties have admitted to having a toke, and lawmakers from both right- and left-wing parties support marijuana legalization. Until 2015, the most outspoken advocate for legalization was the far-right Knesset member Moshe Feiglin, and while Feiglin didn't make it into Knesset in the March election, his cause goes on.

8. A 14-year-old Israeli is the face of Dior

Move over, Bar Refaeli. Sofia Mechetner, a 14-year-old Israeli from the Tel Aviv suburb of Holon, was recently named "the face" of the French fashion label Dior.

Mechetner, who had no prior modelling experience, is the daughter of Soviet immigrants and reportedly shared a bedroom with her two siblings, who she often cared for, as her parents were busy working to make ends meet. She landed the Dior job, in part, by running into the brand's creative director at a Dior store in Paris.

Her recent scantily-clad walk down a Paris runway reignited controversy about youth and high fashion, and fashion insiders have cautioned that modelling young comes with dangers and pressures. But at least for now, says her manager, her family's financial troubles are over. ■

Art from wedding glass shards

SHERI SHEFA
SSHEFA@THECJN.CA

For many, there is no greater milestone in their life than their wedding day, and Terri Mittelmann, a Thornhill-based fused glass artist, designs one-of-a-kind pieces to capture that life-changing event.

For the past eight years, Mittelmann has run her Get2Give Glassworks studio to produce Judaica in the form of contemporary art.

Her most in-demand item is her wedding glass kit, which allows brides and grooms to commission Mittelmann to transform the glass they break under the chupah into items such as mezuzot, picture frames, menorahs or seder plates.

"Most of my work is with the wedding glass kits. The kit comes with the mouth-blown glass and a bag with a design card inside. After the cup is broken, the bride or groom, or whoever it is that is taking charge, will fill out the form. There are a number of options the couple can choose from," Mittelmann explained.

Using the shards of glass broken at the end of the wedding ceremony, Mittelmann produces a unique work of art that serves as both a functional Judaica piece, and a meaningful memento from a couple's wedding day.

She said half her clients are content to fill out the form and send the glass in, and the other half will come in for private consultations.

"Almost every week I am meeting with one or more clients. Sometimes people just want to see more of my work and sometimes they have a special request."

Although Mittelmann's business is only eight years old, she has spent the last 25 years involved in art education, having taught an art class at Bais Yaakov Elementary School, as well as a volunteer art program at Eitz Chaim Day School.

In her career as a fused glass artist working out of her 350-square-foot home studio with two kilns, Mittelmann said she is thrilled to be part of a new wave of Jewish artists offering Judaica in the form of contemporary art that is both steeped in tradition and esthetically modern.

"I don't think there was ever a time when couples didn't actively purchase or receive Judaica. Families still want to have a menorah, seder plate, mezuzah, candlesticks. The concept of being able to personalize these ritual objects by integrating the shards of glass from their wedding ceremony has added a new level of sentiment," Mittelmann said.

"To me, it's a testament to the fact that even in our hectic, high-tech, rushed lives, the pull toward connecting with our roots, our family heritage and our Jewish traditions is still very, very powerful."

She said that although collecting Judaica is not a new trend, more and more artists are producing work that is still traditional, yet modern, "as opposed to the stuff you might think of in your head that you've seen at your grandmother's house.

"I think that although sentiment and tradition still play a very important role, when couples and individuals seek out art with Jewish themes and motifs for their personal space, it's not the only factor in play," she said.

"It has become very clear to me that when people are looking for Judaica to place in their home for display – like any other type of art – it has to appeal to their esthetic sensibility... To me, this is another way of capturing an incredible Jewish milestone in people's lives and I think it's so important." ■

The exhibition Shmita/Seven Generations showcases seven artists' interpretations of the Jewish concept of shmittah and the indigenous concept of seven generations through photography, painting and mixed media works.

A collaboration with the Indigenous Visual Cultural Program at OCAD and the Jewish Agency for Israel, the exhibition is the first of its kind. It's on display at the Gallery at the Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave., until Sept. 30.

While readers may be acquainted with the concept of shmittah, the biblical injunction to let the land rest every seventh year, seven generations is an indigenous perspective and practice applied to all decision-making, impacting a vast range of matters, from use and stewardship of natural resources to economic and peace treaties with other nations. The basic premise is that decisions that provide benefits and stability to the seventh generation into the future are decisions that will benefit all generations.

Shmita/Seven Generations includes works by Chief Lady Bird (Nancy King), Talia Peckel, Aaron Rotenberg, Susan Szenes, Rochelle Rubinstein, Isaac Weber and Darlene J. Winfield. The exhibition is curated by Deanna Di Lello of the MNjcc, David General of OCAD's Indigenous Visual Culture Program and Eran Shafir of the Jewish Agency. ■

Wet Hot American Summer and Jewish stereotypes

Michael Fraiman

Ask any Jew who their favourite character is in Wet Hot American Summer: First Day of Camp and they'll tell you it's the Israeli soccer counsellor, Yaron. The dark-skinned, mop-haired kibbutz export – played with obnoxious vacancy and listless sexuality by the TV show's director, David Wain – has been regarded as such an incredibly spot-on depiction of the modern hippyish Israeli that one writer was inspired to pen "An Ode to the Israeli Summer Camp Sexpot" in Tablet. Jewlicious also lauded the authenticity of Yaron's Birkenstocks and too-unbuttoned denim shirt, while Howard Salzberg, a former co-camper of Wain's, now a camp director, called him "the spitting image of my predecessor....It's hard to watch because it's so funny to me."

There's no doubt that Wain nailed the joke. But what this says about Israeli sexpots is far less telling than what is says about the evolution of onscreen Jewish stereotypes.

Wet Hot American Summer is the Netflix-produced prequel to a critically maligned indie comedy from 2001 of the same name. By some weird happenstance, the then-31-year-old Wain cast such unknown actors as Amy Poehler, Bradley Cooper, Paul Rudd, Joe Lo Truglio, Ken Marino, Christopher Meloni, Molly Shannon and Elizabeth Banks, marking the only time '90s stand-up comedian Janeane Garofalo and David Hyde Pierce (a.k.a. Frasier's brother) would be the top-billed actors amid such a list of names.

Both the original movie and Netflix show take place at a Jewish summer camp. The movie didn't dwell on its characters' Jewishness, but slyly inserted a handful of jokes for Jews to chuckle at: when scrawny little Coop, played by co-writer Michael Showalter, confesses his love to fellow counselor Katie, he blurts out, "I love it that sometimes for no reason you're late for shul!"

It's for the best that Wain and Showalter avoided leaning too heavily on the Jew gags. If they had, the movie (and subsequent show) wouldn't have been as funny – more than alienating goyish viewers, they would have risked Jews rolling their eyes at tired tropes.

Yaron played by David Wain

Wet Hot American Summer is a great example of the changing face of onscreen Jewish stereotypes. Historically, Jewish jokes have written themselves: we're not good at sports, our old-Europe grandparents bicker, Woody Allen frets about anti-Semitism.

Many famous Jewish comedians have subsequently become caricatures of themselves: Larry David is the Jew in a goy's world, Adam Sandler is the Jew who never grew up, Roseanne Barr is the kvetching mom, Jerry Stiller is the hilariously paranoid grandfather you kinda wish you had.

Yaron, though, is a different beast. He's a quiet stereotype – never the focal character, rarely even audible. He impresses the impressionable North American kids with devil sticks and empty-headedness disguised as introspection. He is older, sexually confident and a smoker – so painfully true to real life, you can almost smell his body-sprayed musk.

Ultimately, that's why he's funny: the details injected into Yaron are so precise that they transcend the confines of the stereotype he so obviously is. The joke isn't that he's a caricature; the joke is that he's real.

Broad-stroke stereotypes can be funny, but they only reach brilliance when they're accurate. And accuracy demands specificity. It's the difference between Yaron and Zohan, Sandler's once-upon-a-time Israeli special agent – one parodies someone during a particular time and place, while the other is Adam Sandler with a silly accent.

Good writers understand that being Jewish is no longer a punchline in and of itself. Defining a character by his or her Jewishness traps writers and actors, while audiences lose interest. We want to see real people – people we recognize and recognize as being funny.

Because real Jews aren't Woody Allen. Real Jews go to camp. ■

Award-winning book is worth a second look

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One century after her birth, Toronto author Helen Weinzweig's award-winning novel Basic Black With Pearls has just been reissued by House of Anansi, the Toronto-based publisher that first released the book in 1980.

In the novel, which won a City of Toronto book award, a somewhat deranged, unhappily married female narrator tells her story of a series of liaisons with a mysterious lover who is a foreign spy.

Although many of the trysts occur in exotic locations around the world, most of the novel is set in Toronto, especially the city as remembered by the narrator, Shirley Kaszenbowski, also known as Lola Montez. The backdrop for the story is an exacting cityscape of the old downtown district of the 1940s and 1950s, featuring many familiar and iconic shops, restaurants, bakeries, department stores and city institutions, including Shopsy's and the old Yiddish theatre at Dundas and Spadina.

The novel's strange premise and experimental surrealistic style did not prevent it from gaining a reputation as a minor feminist classic. Kaszenbowski's modus operandi is to check into a prearranged hotel where an envelope is waiting for her. Inside her room, she tears open the envelope and examines the contents, usually some money as well as several pages of a recent magazine such as the National Geographic. Somewhere in the pages of the magazine, she believes, is a coded message telling her where she can meet her secret lover, Coenraad.

"This is the point I am driven towards – that exquisite instant when I receive word of our next meeting," the narrator informs us. "I pack and unpack; find my way to airports, bus stations and railway terminals; shiver or swelter; go hungry or vomit in public toilets. Sometimes I travel half around the earth to decipher a message that instructs me to leave the next day for yet another distant destination."

As she progresses in her lonely and solipsistic romantic quest to join her idealized lover, Kaszenbowski seems to interpret all casual interactions, such as with a saleslady at a scarf counter in a department store, as having immense hidden significance that could help her interpret the clues from the magazine. Romantic illusions, even delusions, seem essential to her inner sense of self and purpose. Is she psychotic or merely driven, as many of us are, to escape from unhappiness into the arms of pleasure?

No matter what momentary pains and anxieties the narrator experiences, however, the journey is rarely without its pleasures for the reader. Weinzweig is an exquisite stylist with a refreshing and often funny way of observing the world. The joy is often in the small details. Here she is, passing through an anonymous convention in the King Edward Hotel, and venturing en passant, as she often does, into a subtle observation of social manners:

"Men in turtlenecks and pipes; women in slacks and shoulder bags, all wearing plastic-covered name tags over the left breast. Those not in line milled about, the women coming up close to the men's chests to read their names, but men keeping their faces at a distance from female breasts, lowering their heads a little if necessary in order to read. A harassed clerk called for reinforcements..."

Life for our narrator does not always occur in the present moment but is often deflected into the past; like many a modern hero, she seems to live largely within her own head. Much of the narrative is filled with reminiscences of previous trysts, her experiences as a girl and a young women, and second-hand Scheherezade-like tales within tales of other lives in European locations, some involving ugly encounters with Nazis.

Basic Black With Pearls,
by Helen Weinzweig
(House of Anansi)

The narrator's peculiar odyssey leads to a dramatic confrontation with her husband, Zbigniew, and the woman who replaced her in his bed. Ultimately, she decides to trade in her adventuress's basic black travelling dress for another swing at domestic life.

Weinzweig, who died in 2010, was born into an Orthodox Jewish family in Poland in 1915 and came to Toronto with her mother at the age of nine after her parents divorced. Inflicted with tuberculosis as a young woman, she spent two years in a sanatorium, where she was a voracious reader of works by Conrad, Barthes, Beckett and others (likely Virginia Woolf among them), who became major influences. As the wife of noted Canadian composer John Weinzweig, she focused on supporting her husband's career and did not launch her own literary career until relatively late in life.

Like many women of her generation, Weinzweig seemed "torn between a commitment to family, and a very real need for freedom and experience," John Frizzell wrote in an introduction in Anansi's new edition of Basic Black With Pearls. Among other possibilities, the book may be interpreted as "an expose of the emptiness of traditional marriage, yet simultaneously a cry for family love, its strengths and support," he observed.

The Jewish Oil Magnates of Galicia (McGill-Queen's University Press)

This 522-page hardcover volume combines two books in one. First, there is Valerie Schatzker's non-fiction scholarly history from 1853 to 1945 of the almost-forgotten East Galician Jews who became early "wildcatters" and oil barons in one of the world's first petroleum industries, concentrated in the region around Boryslaw, Drohobycz, Stary Sambor and other towns.

The second part features The Jewish Oil Magnates, a 1954 Yiddish novel by Galician Holocaust survivor Julien Hirszhaut, adeptly and expertly translated by Miriam Dashkin Beckerman of Toronto.

Early Jewish entrepreneurs refined the paraffin-like substance found in their fields into pure-burning Shabbat candles. That was the genesis of a century-long industry that continued through boom and bust cycles into the era of World War II, when Nazi occupiers, using Jewish slave labourers, squeezed out the last barrels for their war effort.

There is tremendous logic in combining these two unlikely parts into a whole, as each component illuminates the other. The texts are enhanced with numerous regional maps and rare illustrations of the oil fields. Schatzker, who also edited Hirszhaut's novel for publication, deserves credit for bringing this little-known chapter of Galician Jewish history to light. ■

Using social media to gauge 'empathy effect'

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Entrepreneur and artist Kim Smiley said she feels the Internet has become a place of "merciless judgment" and she's counteracting this with her social media project The Empathy Effect.

Roughly 100 days ago, Smiley, a jewelry designer and former vice-president of donor development for the United Jewish Appeal's annual campaign in Toronto, launched what is essentially a year-long social experiment designed to elicit empathy from strangers.

Starting June 8, Smiley, who worked in the non-profit sector for 13 years, created a Facebook group for The Empathy Effect, and each morning, except for Shabbat, she posts a black and white photo she believes will inspire empathy – a picture of a person, an animal, a scene from nature or an inanimate object – accompanied by a short, written description.

"It's a platform to share stories of extraordinary people in the world… Sometimes we get a little cynical… we can become immune to other people's suffering. The project is about reawakening people to something already within us," Smiley said.

Most photos are taken by Smiley herself, but some are sourced from the Internet, from the individual whose story she's sharing or from a member of the person's family.

By using online analytics tools to keep track of the number of Facebook "likes" and shares each post gets, Smiley is attempting to assess which stories resonate with people.

Social entrepreneur and artist Kim Smiley is hoping to spread empathy with a year-long social media experiment. BRIAN ABRACEN PHOTO

She's ultimately seeking to address the more challenging question of whether the project will mobilize followers to become more empathetic in their flesh and blood lives.

"It's the whole question that underlies the experiment: can we take an online experiment on empathy and transmit it into something living and breathing in this world?" Smiley said.

It's not clear how this will be achieved, or even gauged, though Smiley said she's gotten incredible feedback from followers of the group, and suggested that her daily post could contribute to their starting their day on a positive note, "looking around with eyes of empathy instead of being disgruntled and cynical."

At the end of 365 days, the person profiled in or connected to the photo (even the nature photos typically include some profile of a person) that garners the most online engagement will get to choose a charity to be the recipient of a cash prize, which Smiley said will be a minimum of $5,000.

The money will come from Smiley's socially minded jewelry business, Sappho by Kim Smiley, which hires and trains marginalized women to make the jewelry at $18 per hour and donates 20 per cent of the proceeds from its trunk shows to charity.

Smiley said she's seeking other individuals and companies to contribute to The Empathy Effect prize.

On the day of this writing, The Empathy Effect Facebook group had 46,112 members, and Smiley said it's been interesting to observe which posts "spread virally."

For example, the most popular post to date was one she put up on Day 5 of the experiment.

It featured Matthew Morton, an obstetrician/ gynecologist at Mount Sinai Hospital who was diagnosed with brain cancer at 32, and told he had 12 to 18 months to live.

Seven years later, on Morton's 39th birthday, Smiley posted a homage to him, praising the way he and his wife "seize[d] the precious fragility of each day." After Morton's diagnosis he completed a medical fellowship, received an award for excellence in residence education and had two more children.

Analytics showed Smiley that more than 75,000 people saw the post, 1,709 people liked it and 270 shared it.

Two months later, Morton died.

A more recent post featured a tribute to neurologist and author Oliver Sacks, emphasizing his unique dignity and humanity.

While Smiley creates and writes most of the site's content based on things that catch her eye or inspire her, she's also hoping to cultivate what she calls a "confederacy of dreamers," a global network of people who will contribute written posts to the page or submit photographs to accompany posts.

"I want to show empathy on a global scale, not just through a local lens," she said.

She emphasized that she didn't initiate the project out of a belief that there's an "empathy deficit" in the world.

Rather, she feels that people can sometimes use a reminder to bring their awareness back to caring about the lives and the suffering of others.

"We're often bombarded with such negative news, with people's lack of compassion. I want to create a counterforce to that," she said. ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

JCC Maccabi girls bring home the hardware

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Toronto Blue girls 16U soccer team won gold and bronze medals.

There was a time, perhaps, when girls just wanted to have fun. Now, they want to win – and then have some fun.

Girls teams were a big part of Toronto's contingent at last month's JCC Maccabi Games and ArtsFest in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and the girls did their share of winning, bringing home gold, silver and bronze medals.

The Toronto Blue girls 16 and under (16U) soccer team, one of two fielded in the competition, won a gold medal as well as a bronze. The 16U girls basketball team won a gold medal, as did the 14U team. The boys 16U basketball team won silver, losing to Philadelphia in the finals by a score of 67-57, while the boys 14U team earned a gold medal by defeating Hart/EB 65-49. The contingent of six swimmers (not all of them girls) came home with 24 medals in all.

Not bad for a city that, only five years ago in Baltimore, sent a team of 10 athletes in all. This year's contingent was 90 strong, making it the second-largest team at the competition, said Alex Voihanski, head of the Toronto delegation.

Altogether, some 1,600 Jewish teens participated in the sports competitions and arts events, from across the eastern United States as well as from Great Britain, Israel, Poland and Australia.

Forty members of the Toronto team were girls, and the most dominant athlete on the team, in any sport, was a girl, Voihanski said.

He was referring to Samantha Brown, the shooting guard for the 16U basketball team, who will "age out" and no longer be available to participate in next year's Games, which are for athletes 13-16 years old.

In her two years leading the basketball team, she's averaged 35-40 points a game. In the gold medal contest this year against Philadelphia, she scored 26 points in a row despite being double- and triple-teamed, pacing the Toronto team to a 52-45 win.

"She was literally unstoppable. Without question she is the most dominant athlete we've had since we took over six years ago," Voihanski said, referring to the time when he and Jeremy Blustein of JCC Chai Sports assumed responsibility for the Toronto team.

Girls are turning to sports like never before, and many are getting their entrée through programs offered by JCC Chai Sports. The organization's house league soccer program alone serves about 100 girls, he said.

Overall, "women's sports are getting humongous" in Toronto, as girls and their families see the benefits of it plus the growing opportunity of earning scholarships in sports programs at colleges south of the border.

In other JCC Maccabi results, swimmer Chad Walt won gold medals in the 200-metre freestyle event as well as the 200-metre backstroke. He added to his haul with silver medals in the 14U 50-metre freestyle, 100-metre butterfly and 50-metre breaststroke, along with a bronze in the 200-metre individual medley.

Megan Pearlman won a bronze medal in the 50-metre butterfly for girls 14U and a silver in the 200-metre backstroke and 50-metre backstroke.

The boys 16U baseball team finished out of the medals, while the boys 16U soccer team likewise finished without any hardware. ■

JNF Negev Dinner

Everything was beautiful, including the 350 guests attending the JNF Pacific Region dinner honouring John Baird, Canada's former minister of foreign affairs. Guests and dignitaries included representatives of major Jewish institutions, rabbis and Minister of Justice Suzanne Anton (representing British Columbia). Also in attendance were Rafael Barak, Israel's Ambassador to Canada and Avi Dickstein, executive director of resources development division at KKL-JNF. Proceeds will support the creation of the Sderot Memorial Park. This morale-lifting new park, which will be named after Baird, will host a variety of family oriented activities for residents of a city that has been the ongoing target of rocket attacks from the Gaza Strip since 2001. ■ – The Socialite

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

The saga of red and grey

Dr. Michael Gordon

Sometimes things happen that trigger important associations, and it can be hard to follow a conversation when someone interrupts a train of thought with an interjection about a personal, associated experience.

For some, this derails the train of the conversation or is interpreted as not paying attention, but that is the way the brain works – compellingly, for some people. When it occurs in fiction or cinema, it is often characterized as flashback and deemed to be an effective way of showing how an experience ties into a person's collective memory.

For those dealing with people living with dementia, however, it is well recognized, because the past is often retained in all its vividness so that associations will bring back memories – not all of which may be pleasant – and thereby cause disquiet in the person for whom those memories are being reactivated.

For me, the saga of red and grey was not so profound – it was merely the proximity of the events that I came to associate with one aspect of my practice.

The first part of my short saga started as I was loading heavily laden bags into the back of my car after a recent visit to Costco. As I juggled one bag, a plastic bin of bright red, sweet and delicious tomatoes fell from the bag, and with the impact, the plastic cover came off and the road next to the car was strewn with these gorgeous, pecan-sized tomatoes. I decided to gather them up, with the idea of washing them when I got home – not particularly worried that the ground would have made them inedible. I gathered them, put them back in the container and drove home. As I lifted the bag out of the trunk, some of the delectables fell onto my driveway, and there I was gathering them up again.

Later that morning, I had to buy some grey concrete paint to redo a backyard retaining wall from which the winter-battered paint had been peeling. My son, who is well-versed in renovations, instructed me to put on primer and use grey concrete outdoor paint to do the job properly.

> For the elderly patients I care for, one of the most devastating events that can occur in their lives is a fall.

As I put the paint into the cart at the store, I did not notice that because the cart was designed so that children could put their legs through the it, the back of the cart was in fact open, and the next thing I knew, the can was on the floor – the top off – and paint spilled everywhere. Eventually, the grey ooze was covered by a sawdust mixture as the staff person soothed my guilty thoughts and told me that not only does it happen all the time, but, indeed, the design of the cart is a bit misleading, as most people do not realize the back is open so that smaller items can fall through – as did the can of paint.

So what is the association between the fall not from "grace" as exists in Christian liturgy but to paraphrase, a fall from a higher place? This brings me to the association. For the elderly patients I care for, one of the most devastating events that can occur in their lives is a fall, from almost any height, that results in either a major fracture or an injury, for example to the head, and the resultant loss of independence and what has often been termed the "fear of falling."

Thus, the focus by all of us involved in eldercare as family or health-care professionals is to promote safe mobility and decrease fall risk: such as at home, especially doing a washroom safety check, and the use of mobility aids to provide as much security as possible.

Take heed, preventing falls is crucial. The result is not as simple as picking up spilled tomatoes or splattered grey paint: it can result in a life change that no one wants to experience. ■

Yacov Fruchter explains why confession is an important aspect in the repentance process
Rabbi Shalom Spira wonders whether Moses really authored the final verses of the Torah
Rachael Turkienicz suggests that the Torah acts as an eternal meeting place for our souls

Yacov Fruchter

I'm sitting in Emmanuel College, the United Church building at University of Toronto as I write this. Though we usually associate confession with Christian practice, a central component of our Yom Kippur experience is the Viddui confession ceremony.

With our backs slightly hunched over, we beat our chests with each mention of the word "Chatanu – We have sinned," and sing loudly, "For all these sins, forgiving God, forgive us, pardon us, grant us atonement."

Rambam explains that confession is a vital component of tshuvah – repentance, and without it, our repentance is not complete and our desired increased closeness to God will not be reached. As most of us only experience this kind of confession one day a year, it can feel foreign. So why do we do it, and why is it important for us to go through these motions throughout Yom Kippur?

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel explains that the essence of confession is the feeling of shame that ensues. "What the world needs is a sense of embarrassment. We are guilty of misunderstanding the meaning of existence; we are guilty of distorting our goals and misrepresenting our souls." He argues that we need this humbling experience to reorient ourselves within our personal goals and our mandate as Jews and citizens of the earth.

He also offers an explanation for the reason that the list of transgressions is written in plural form, as well as our need to confess for sins that might not be among our personal errors. While some suggest that we are guilty of all sins in some form, Rabbi Heschel uses this tradition to remind us of our collective responsibility for the other. He writes: "Few are guilty, all are responsible."

May this be a year in which our sense of shame opens us up to a greater feeling of responsibility and dedication to the collective good, and may we all be blessed with the sweetest of new years. ■

Yacov Fruchter is director of community building and spiritual engagement at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"Take this Torah scroll" (Deut. 31:26). The Gemara (Bava Batra 15a), grapples with the paradox of how Moses could have transcribed the final eight verses of the Torah scroll, which describe his own death. Rabbi Yehudah/Nechemiah insists that they were actually written by Joshua. Rabbi Shimon counters by invoking Deut. 31:26, which proves that the scroll must have already been complete. After all, a Torah scroll missing even one word would not be kosher. Rather, continues Rabbi Shimon, even the last verses were written by Moses, albeit bedema (literally "with tears," but alternatively "in a jumbled form").

Rabbi Moshe Sofer (Torat Mosheh, third edition) to Deut. 34:5, elucidates bedema based on an oral tradition from the Vilna Gaon. Nachmanides (introduction to Pentateuch) comments that the Torah scroll existed before Creation as black fire written on white fire. The Vilna Gaon explains that whereas the Torah is eternal, it catalogues events that unfolded within our space-time continuum. As each event materialized, the portion of the scroll describing that event became legible to human observers. Those portions describing future events remained "jumbled," in other words, unintelligible to any human observer other than a prophet. Rabbi Sofer concludes that both opinions are true: Moses wrote the ultimate verses in a jumbled form, and then Joshua rewrote them legibly.

Interestingly, the Gemara (Kiddushin 29b) records a dispute between Rabbi Yehudah and the sages on whether a Torah scroll has the status of a commercial IOU document (shtar). Rabbi Yehudah holds to the affirmative. Elsewhere, the Gemara (Ketubot 21b), posits that when a court supervises the preparation of a shtar, the court must avoid mitchazei keshikra, or the "appearance of falsehood," by prematurely signing on future events. It is thus appropriate why specifically Rabbi Yehudah would express dismay about the final verses, and why the solution resides in their being jumbled, thereby negating the "appearance" (literally) of falsehood. ■

There is a beautiful midrash connected with this week's parshah that brings us to the essence of Yom Kippur. Moses is preparing for his death and has been addressing the nation with various messages.

Moses' greatest fear is that without him, Israel will turn against God, forget the Covenant and force a horrible outcome. Moses has warned them, threatened them, pleaded with them, and now he is recording everything in written form, in what we know as the Torah.

There is a discussion among the sages as to how many Torah scrolls Moses wrote at that time. The consensus is that he wrote 13 scrolls, one for each tribe and one extra. Some sages say that the extra Torah scroll was placed in the Ark of the Covenant. The Torah says it was placed next to the Ark. The midrash says that the angel Gabriel picked up the scroll and brought it to the Upper Realms.

The question is why the Upper Realms would need a Torah scroll. In fact, earlier in the Torah, when Moses receives the Ten Commandments, one midrash discusses how Moses proves to the angels that they do not need the Law. With that resolved, why would Gabriel bring the Torah scroll upward?

But it is not the angels who need the Torah. Rather, the sages say that the righteous souls above continue to read, study and chant the Torah at the times that we do. In other words, the Torah becomes an everlasting meeting place for all our souls.

As Yom Kippur approaches, we are reminded that the stakes could not be higher and it is possible to lose someone we love in the coming year. Modern society makes us feel that once someone has died they are lost to us forever. Judaism teaches us that when souls connect, they connect eternally. ■

Give thanks for the abundant harvest during Sukkot

JUDY BART KANCIGOR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Unlike Rosh Hashanah, Sukkot, the week-long festival beginning at sundown Sept. 27, actually is mentioned in the Torah (Leviticus 23:34-39). Immediately following the fast of Yom Kippur, Jews the world over begin constructing sukkot (booths) in preparation for the joyous feast that begins four days later. How our forefathers must have rejoiced to enjoy the fruits of their labours, closer to the heavens, as the growing season culminated in bushels of plenty.

Jewish cuisine, at least in the Mediterranean, has had a long love affair with vegetables, and what better way to celebrate this thanksgiving of the harvest than with a trip to your local farmers' market.

Today I accompany Amelia Saltsman – writer, cooking teacher and author of The Santa Monica Farmers' Market Cookbook (Blenheim Press) on a stroll through the market. But there are frequent interruptions, because this is the Santa Monica Farmers' Market, and Saltsman is the undisputed queen of this market and instantly recognized by farmers and shoppers alike.

Every grower greets Saltsman, who has immortalized them in her cookbook, which is a homage to the farmers, and a collection of fuss-less, original and artful recipes inspired by the amazing varieties they produce.

Now Saltsman has combined her expertise on all things growing and her love of her Jewish heritage in her new cookbook, The Seasonal Jewish Kitchen (Sterling Epicure), with recipes from both her Romanian mother's and her Iraqi father's families, and seasonal spins on such favourites as Roast Chicken with Tangerines, Green Olives and Silan; Marinated Chickpea Salad with Tahini and Lemon Sauce; Golden Borscht with Buttermilk and Ginger; and Apple, Pear and Concord Grape Galette in Rye Pastry.

Persimmon, pomegranate and pecan salad

Source: The Santa Monica Farmers' Market Cookbook by Amelia Saltsman

- ❑ 1 pomegranate
- ❑ 4 ribs celery, preferably inner, whiter ribs with leaves
- ❑ 2 small or 1 large persimmon
- ❑ 1/2 cup pecan or walnut pieces, toasted
- ❑ 1/2 lb. mixed baby salad greens
- ❑ about 1 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil or nut oil
- ❑ 1 lemon
- ❑ kosher or sea salt and freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ 1/2 cup crumbled feta cheese (optional)

To remove pomegranate kernels, make a cut near blossom end of fruit, submerge pomegranate in bowl of water, and break fruit into large pieces. Use your fingers to loosen kernels, then drain and reserve. They will keep refrigerated up to 3 days.

Use vegetable peeler to peel celery, then slice paper-thin on diagonal. Place in salad bowl along with leaves.

Core persimmon, cut vertically into quarters, then crosswise into thin slices. Add to bowl along with nuts, greens and as many pomegranate kernels as you like.

Grate zest from lemon in long, thin strands into bowl. Drizzle on oil, squeeze in lemon juice and season with salt and pepper. Toss well and sprinkle with cheese, if using. Yield: 8 servings.

Gvetch: roasted Romanian ratatouille

Source: The Seasonal Jewish Kitchen by Amelia Saltsman

- ❑ 2 lb. fleshy sauce tomatoes such as Roma
- ❑ 4-6 medium-size green or white zucchini (about 1-1/2 lb.)
- ❑ 2 medium eggplants (about 1-1/2 lb. total)
- ❑ 3 or 4 sweet red peppers
- ❑ 1 or 2 onions, peeled
- ❑ 6-8 large garlic cloves, peeled
- ❑ 1 tbsp. sweet or hot paprika, or a mix
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. ground cumin
- ❑ 2 bay leaves
- ❑ 3-4 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
- ❑ about 2 tsp. kosher or sea salt
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 400. Roughly chop tomatoes, zucchini, eggplants, sweet peppers and onions into about 1-in. pieces. Transfer vegetables to large roasting pan with garlic, paprika, cumin, bay leaves, olive oil and several grinds of pepper. Toss to mix; spread evenly. Roast without stirring until vegetables are very tender and browned in places and tomatoes have melted into a thick sauce, about 1 hour. Serve warm or at room temperature. ■

Rabbi Jonathan Ziring: applying Jewish ethics to journalism

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Earlier this month, Rabbi Jonathan Ziring joined CJN editor Yoni Goldstein at Toronto's Yeshivat B'nei Akiva Or Chaim in a debate about the relationship between Judaism and journalism ethics.

Some of the questions debated were: in what ways does journalism contribute positively to society? How does one reconcile the impulse of journalism to report with the Jewish value of maintaining privacy? How should a Jewish newspaper walk the line between reporting wrongdoing and avoiding portraying Judaism in a bad light? When is a Jewish community newspaper entitled to put the public interest ahead of the interests of innocent third parties? Is it possible for a newspaper to promote a particular perspective on a given issue and still report the facts of that issue impartially?

Rabbi Ziring, a Staten Island-native, received his bachelor's degree from Yeshiva University's Yeshiva College in philosophy and Jewish studies, his master's from the Bernard Revel Graduate School in Jewish Philosophy, and smichah from Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS).

As a fellow with the Tikvah Fund, a non-profit group that offers grants to promote Jewish scholarship, Rabbi Ziring developed an extensive theory of journalistic ethics from a halachic perspective.

Over the next two years, Rabbi Ziring will be living in Toronto and will serve as a sgan rosh beit midrash at Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov of Toronto, an organization that aims to educate the Jewish community by applying Torah values to modern issues through classes and discussions.

In an interview with The CJN, Rabbi Ziring spoke about the some of the ethical issues that Jewish journalists must grapple with.

Where does your familiarity with journalism ethics come from?

A few years ago, I taught a class once a week at the Columbia University Hillel, and they ended up asking me to give a series on journalism, so I gave a semester-long series there, and then three years ago, I was a fellow at the Tikvah Fund and they were intrigued by the series I had given at Columbia and asked me, for their research project with them, to turn it into a written project, a series of articles that I put together and have been in the process of getting published since then.

I spent the year working on that with Neal Kozodoy, the former editor at Commentary, as one of my guides from the journalistic perspective and Rabbi Mark Gottlieb, who is the senior director at the Tikvah Fund.

Rabbi Jonathan Ziring applies Torah values to modern issues through classes and discussion.

Does it complicate things to look at media ethics through the lens of Jewish values?

It definitely complicates things. We start with a language problem on one level. Getting the conversation started is always difficult, because you have to change your frame of reference.

One you've gotten past that initial hurdle, there is a lot of room to bring the two into conversation. Jewish law and philosophy has much to say on these ethical questions that arise in media ethics.

There is a debate among different ethicists about using anonymous sourcing, for example.

Jewish law has a strong position, where, except in the most extenuating of circumstances, it opposes it.

What legitimates our belief in someone when he says that someone else did something wrong is the fact that he is willing to put his name on the line. And hiding behind anonymity would force us to draw into question his honesty and integrity in the situation. That's a small example.

There is a divergence of law, of libel law, in western countries. In America, for example, the right of the public to know is so great that we can't hinder the ability of the press to publicize information with overly exacting libel law. So in America, it is impossible to really convict someone of libel – you have to prove not only that the information was incorrect, but that there was malice. It's very rarely successfully litigated.

> Jewish law has something to say on this balance, on the importance of whether the right of the public to know was so great as to minimize the rights of an individual's privacy.

In the Canadian Supreme Court and British Supreme Court, that hasn't been the case. These supreme courts have found, in both countries, that the press, more often, needs to prove the necessity for the public good before they have the right to publicize something that is defamatory. Jewish law has something to say on this balance, on the importance of whether the right of the public to know was so great as to minimize the rights of an individual's privacy.

When I was researching, it was helpful to bring into conversation this divergence of law.

How should a Jewish newspaper navigate a situation where reporting on an issue may be of public interest, but have negative consequences for a person, institution or community in general?

When you punish a criminal, you need to get him off the streets, and you know this will affect the family, but there is nothing you can do, because society has to take responsibility.

Sometimes it is going to be inevitable, that information needs to get out. On the other hand, we should want to balance it. If on some level, the ethical justification of the right of the public to know was the belief that on some level it will improve society, it's definitely a hard ethical and legal call to make, with different decisions calling for different balances.

There is a passage in the Talmud about preventing the desecration of the name of God. It talks about a hypocrite, someone who parades himself about as a righteous person, but is in fact, a criminal behind closed doors. At least some of the commentary says it means that the existence of people like that, even if no one knows about it, is in itself a desecration of God's name and it has to be undone. There is a positive value of people knowing that good people are good and bad people are bad.

People in the Jewish community might say, "How could you publicize that this person was abusive? You're causing a desecration of God by publicizing it."

The Talmud says that you publicize that type of thing, because if you don't, that is a desecration of God's name. So the Talmud has the opposite position, which is that publicizing the abuse was not a desecration, but the desecration was when the person committed the crime to begin with. The way to rectify it is by rooting it out and bringing it to light. That may not be the most popular thing to say in the Jewish community. ■

Yom Kippur with St. Francis of Assisi

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Silent shadows draped in dark brown Franciscan robes passed by the two frescoes of the life of Isaac by Giotto in the Basilica of St. Francis of Assisi and ascended the Romanesque tower of the upper church to look out for German forces that might crawl along the serpentine road in the valley below.

The date was Oct. 9, 1943: northern Italy had been occupied by Hitler after the overthrow of Mussolini and the hunt for Jews was in full swing.

It was also the night of Yom Kippur.

In the Basilica of Saint Francis, nuns and priests who were about to break bread with Jewish refugees seeking succour in churches, convents, living quarters of clergy and monasteries throughout Assisi, had done their best to prepare a meagre meal while respecting the dietary laws of Moses.

As the autumn lights retreated over the hill towns of Tuscany, the Jews recited silently the Kol Nidrei in a small and secret enclosure, not far from the crypt of Saint Francis. There was no Ark to be opened, no two people to take two Torah scrolls; and no cantor to storm the Heavens. But, as guests they had ample opportunity to behold the beautiful Old Testament paintings adorning the nave of the ancient church featuring in two rows a total of 32 scenes starting, among others, with Creation of the World, Isaac, Jacob and Esau and Joseph Forgives his Brothers.

While they pondered their fate on the eve of the Day of Atonement, the question as to who would be inscribed in the Book of Life became laden with foreboding. Who would live and who would die – who by fire and who by water, who by the sword and who by wild beasts? Who, indeed, by the sword and who by wild beasts? And yet, in spite of the conflicting emotions raging in their troubled souls, in the fledgling light of reticent candles, they must have discerned the colour of hope in faces of the righteous among them who were risking their own lives.

As the SS hounds roamed the hills of Tuscany in search of prey, the good people hailing from the good earth of Italy succeeded in instilling a palpable sense of optimism in the minds of the refugees who were drowning in despair only a few days before.

> The entire town of Assisi had been turned into a sanctuary for Jews

And they were right to hope, in the midst of hope-defying adversity, when they saw that the entire town of Assisi had been turned into a sanctuary for Jews. Jewish babies were born, old people died and received secret Jewish burials in unmarked graves, young couples married, the sick were treated, the hungry fed, the naked clothed and the frightened comforted.

But danger was the constant and faithful companion of these hapless souls.

There were close calls. By 1944, the SS had unleashed a relentless hunt in German-occupied Italy although it was by then clear that the Nazis would soon lose the war.

In February of that year, according to Peter J. Ognibene writing in Italian America about the Assisi Underground, the elaborate operation to save Jews hiding in Assisi was on the verge of collapsing. Three Jewish refugees and an Italian deserter who were running the fake documentation office were arrested. Although they were later released, thanks to the powerful intervention of church authorities, the clergy in charge of the basilica could not take the risk and told the refugees to gather their belongings and immediately follow the warden through medieval tunnels into forests and caverns.

These were the very caverns carved into mountains and secret grottoes bedazzled with subterranean lakes and waterfalls that had once sheltered St. Francis and his followers. They stayed for a week and returned when it became clear that the rescue effort had not been betrayed.

Who were these good people of the good earth? They were Msgr. Giuseppe Nicolini, the Bishop of Assisi; Col. Valentin Muller, a Catholic Wehrmacht medical doctor whose secret help saved so many lives; and Don Aldo Brunacci, the Bishop's secretary who organized the entire underground rescue mission.

All those who prayed on Yom Kippur in 1943 in the Basilica of St. Francis of Assisi were inscribed in the Book of Life. ■

Naked outrage, and Coulter and Khamenei tweet about Jews

Student awarded $1M in abuse case

Hadassah Ehrlich, a former student at a haredi day school in Melbourne, Australia, who says she was sexually abused by the principal was awarded $1 million in damages from the Adass Israel School Sept. 16. The judge said actions by the school to help former principal Malka Leifer flee Australia in 2008 were "deplorable and disgraceful." Allegations against Leifer surfaced after she left Australia, and the school has been criticized for not contacting police. Leifer was arrested in Israel and faces extradition on 74 charges of sexual abuse against girls at the school. Ehrlich sued for offences that allegedly started in 2002, when she was 15.

Like peas in a f—ing Twitter pod

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei and American conservative pundit Ann Coulter have at least one thing in common: they think the U.S. Republican party panders to Jews. Referring to last week's Republican presidential debate, Khamenei decried on Twitter that "presidential candidates try to satisfy Zionists." In a related tweet, he repeated a claim he made earlier this month that Israel will not last. During the Sept. 18 debate itself, Coulter expressed frustration with multiple pledges to support Israel, tweeting: "How many f—ing Jews do these people think there are in the United States?" After being criticized, she said her comment was taken out of context, adding she's pro-Israel and the debate played into stereotypes about Jewish power while wasting time on issues the party agrees on.

Body issues in the Holy Land

Not everyone in the Middle East appreciates the human form, it seems. Photos posted Sept. 16 of Spanish pro-Palestinian activists posing naked in protest of the West Bank security barrier were called disrespectful and caused unintended outrage on Palestinian social media, in part because they were taken near a Ramallah mosque. On the other side of the fence, inspired by ESPN The Magazine's annual body issue, Yediot Achronot earlier this month published artful naked pictures of 14 top Israeli athletes by fashion photographer Gabriel Baharlia. No word about a Twitter backlash.■

Choose refugees wisely

If, as Bernie Farber believes, Canada should become an "open haven for refugees fleeing persecution," ("Jewish groups urge Ottawa to help Syrian refugees," Sept. 10), then we should concentrate on bringing in the groups who most clearly qualify as persecuted: Syrian and Iraqi Christians and Yazidis.

War in one's homeland is not an automatic ticket to refugee status, and eventual citizenship, in Canada. After all, there were plenty of ordinary Germans who wanted to leave Germany at the end of World War II. Where Canada's government failed was not in refusing to let in more of them, but in failing to let in any Jews at all five years before.

Jews do not vote blindly

A letter to the editor claimed that Jews have blindly voted Liberal for the last 100 years ("Who is best for the Jews?", Sept. 10) but in the same issue, columnist Howard Adelman writes, "Why the Tories are winning the Jewish vote." I take issue with both these views.

Jews do not vote blindly. The only blind devotion is the view that because Prime Minister Stephen Harper has been vocal about his support for Israel, Jews should vote Conservative.

Without a doubt, Harper's support of Israel has been outstanding.

But what about Harper's multi-billion dollar arms deal with Saudi Arabia, whose human rights abuses include beheadings? Or the fact that this same government sold the Canadian Wheat Board to a company that is also, in part, owned by Saudi Arabia.

Harper's lack of leadership on issues such as climate change, support for the scientific community in environmental research, veterans affairs and missing aboriginal women has been abominable. Canadian Jews should not be blinded by one issue only.

United Church responds

The United Church of Canada is concerned that the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus understands our actions in relation to justice and peace in Israel and Palestine to be a barrier to interfaith dialogue here in Canada ("Christians and Jews," Sept. 3).

We remain committed to dialogue with people of all faiths, in the spirit of the affirmations made in our 1997 statement, Mending the World, in which we have laid out the framework for our engagement in ecumenical and interfaith relations.

The recent actions of the General Council are consistent with United Church policy since the 1970s, and with the call of partners in Israel and Palestine who seek justice and peace through non-violent means. Our partners include Jewish voices who have denounced continued expansion of illegal settlements in occupied Palestinian territory, house demolitions and other violations of the human rights of Palestinians. The actions of the General Council reaffirm United Church policy calling for safety and security for Israel within internationally recognized borders. The action does not target Israel. Rather, the focus is Israeli policies and practices relating to the occupation of Palestinian territories.

Partners in both Israel and Palestine insist that it is only with the end of occupation that any real possibility of coexistence, reconciliation, and economic co-operation will be generated. With the General Council action, the United Church joins with many other organizations and people around the world who view economic action not as a measure of coercion or punishment, but as a peaceful, non-violent way to press for change that will bring about peace with justice for Israelis and Palestinians. Such actions call us as consumers and investors to end our complicity in government and corporate policies and practices that maintain the occupation and its terrible cost in the lives of both Israelis and Palestinians.

We acknowledge the challenges that our differences on these difficult issues create for maintaining dialogue. Nevertheless, we would value opportunities, formal or informal, to engage in conversation with the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus and with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and to discover areas of concern we may share. It is our hope that we can continue to be in dialogue with all who pray and yearn for justice and peace in Israel-Palestine.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Jewish living, inside and out

Sukkot reminds us that synagogues must empower Jews to lead meaningful lives beyond their walls, too

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: Recently, I have begun a program called "Pop-Up Rabbi," where I stand outside a local coffee shop next to a sign that invites passers-by to "ask a rabbi any question."

The interactions have been extraordinarily meaningful, and the initiative has been well-received. It's an example of a synagogue expanding its horizons and moving beyond the comfort zone of its bricks-and-mortar building.

This, I believe, is part of the message of Sukkot – that our religious life isn't to be confined to our buildings. We step out of our comfort zones and engage those outside or on the periphery.

How have you seen this idea effectively implemented in your community?

Rabbi Cutler: Beth Tzedec is a believer in out-of-the-shul Judaism – both myself and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl have held programs in coffee shops. We have also taught classes in places of business during lunch hours. Purim parties have taken place in music venues and the Megillah has been read at a local kosher restaurant. These initiatives are usually designed to be short-lived. Once the novelty wears off, we try something new.

Our shuls are buildings, but they represent ideas and fulfil missions. I believe that we are tasked with driving forward the mission in the best way possible. We need buildings for our mission, but we also need at times to step out of them. What you are describing is bringing the inside out, taking what is core to us and bringing it to the public.

What about the other way? Should we also be trying to bring the outside in? Should shuls be doing more to drive traffic into our building? Should we be catering more to the general public?

Rabbi Scheier: Yes, our buildings are holy tools used to convey a holy message. Jewish thought emphasizes the power of sacred space – the power to inspire and to serve as a focal point for communal activity and vision.

Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach shared a beautiful teaching about the Neilah service that concludes Yom Kippur. Neilah, which literally means "locking (of the gates)," is traditionally understood as the locking of the gates of prayer – as in, don't lock us out. But Rabbi Carlebach said that it could be the opposite, too – don't lock us in!

The message for me is that Jewish life belongs everywhere – in coffee shops, in the workplace, and, of course, in the home. While many of our outreach initiatives might be short-lived, the message of Judaism's reach can be profound.

Perhaps one way to accomplish this ideal is to teach a form of Judaism inside the synagogue that can be easily implemented outside the synagogue as well.

What is the "take home message" you would like your congregants to leave shul with?

Rabbi Cutler: At our family-oriented Shabbat dinners, we recently began distributing cards to be taken home. The cards are designed to assist families in at-home Shabbat rituals – the blessing of the children, Kiddush, Hamotzi, etc. As rabbis, we are tasked with empowering Jews to live Jewish lives at shul, but also at home and in their day-to-day lives.

In a saying by Moses Mendelsohn that has been eternalized by Y.L. Gordon, one is instructed to be "a Jew at home and a man on the street." But this is a sentiment that does not sit well with me (even if neither Mendelsohn nor Gordon meant to take it to its extreme) – lived Judaism is not meant to limit itself to certain geographical locales, be they the home, the synagogue or elsewhere. Instead, lived Judaism is meant to permeate all aspects of our lives, wherever we may find ourselves.

A synagogue that can inspire such a Judaism – irrespective of whether encounters with rabbis take place in the building or beyond – will be one that achieves tremendous success. ■

Siegel, one of the most effective volunteer leaders in the history of Toronto's Jewish community, and Scheuer, a philanthropist and father of Reform Judaism in Canada, were most likely at the school event because of their mutual interest and involvement in aiding Jewish immigrants and in Jewish education and training.

A workman puts finishing touches on a wall commemorating the Righteous Among the Nations, gentiles who rescued Jews in the Shoah. The wall is among several new additions to the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Earl Bales Park. In all, the site will have more than 30 new elements, including walls, pillars, gardens, monuments, and a six-branched Yad Vashem menorah in the central square. The renovation campaign began two years ago, with work starting last spring. The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem will host a Yizkor service Oct. 4 at the site, when the new elements will be unveiled.

From Yoni's Desk

Jewish journalists: the next generation

On March 26, 2006, I received an email from then-Canadian Jewish News editor Mordechai Ben-Dat. "Dear Yoni," it began, "Are you ready to roll?"

It was the break I'd been waiting for, a chance to publish to a national audience my opinions about the Jewish community, and hopefully spur conversation about the future of Jewish life in Canada, the Diaspora and Israel. "You will have a wide berth to discuss whatever issues of Jewish life you deem relevant," he added in a followup email. "Please give us your voice."

For the next three years, my byline appeared once a month on the inside back page of The CJN, in a space called "New Views" (the title came from Mordechai; the accompanying picture was entirely my fault). The column covered familiar topics, like the topsy-turvy world of Israeli politics and the challenges of Jewish education, as well as emerging issues like the early days of what would come to be called the open Orthodox movement, modern Yiddish culture and child abuse.

Mordechai and The CJN's editing team always employed a gentle hand, even when I tested their limits with copy that shot from the hip and offered little nuance on complicated issues. On the few occasions when they did step in, it was to save me from myself.

Looking back on those "New Views" columns recently, the thing that struck me the most was my tone. It was unabashedly snarky, critical, sarcastic, contemptuous, mocking, even mean at times. I was in my mid-20s, trying to find my way personally and professionally, and that came across in my words. I sounded angry, and frustrated by the continuing dominance in the Jewish community of what I perceived to be old and outdated ideas.

A lot has changed in the near-decade since that first column was published. I'm older now, a husband and a father, and my perspective has changed somewhat.

But even so, I'd like to think that The Canadian Jewish News still embodies the spirit of "New Views," at least a little. And I hope The CJN can continue to play a role in helping young Jewish writers find their voices, the same way it helped me discover mine.

I feel strongly that one of our most important ongoing projects at The CJN is to tap into the energy and vitality of youth, and to foster the development of young Jewish writers and activists. It's the best way I can think of for us to help cultivate the next generation of Canadian Jewish leaders. Jewish journalism, as I argued last week, is of great benefit to our community because it empowers individuals, especially young people.

Young writers can sometimes be hard to stomach. The sorts of opinions they tend to express – the sorts of opinions I once expressed in "New Views" – are not always easy for everyone to hear. But that's the spirit of youth for you. I truly believe that we need to take every opportunity we have to encourage and nurture our young people, even when the ideas they express sting or seem counter-intuitive. A few new views here and there never hurt anyone. ■ — YONI

Alan Baker

In light of some serious misconceptions in Mira Sucharov's column ("Is it time to have a debate about the JNF?"Aug. 6), according to which the land on which the Jewish National Fund-administered Canada Park is located was illegally stolen from Palestinians in contravention of the Geneva Convention, the following points need to be made.

The land, including the former Arab villages that existed in what is now Canada Park, was never part of any Palestinian state or entity. No such entity has ever existed, and hence the land could not have been "stolen" from a non-existent entity that neither owned nor occupied it.

During the 1948-49 War of Independence, in which, as is widely known, Israel defended itself from a combined attack by neighbouring and local Arab forces, the area in question, including the villages that were located there, together with units of the Jordanian army, played an active and strategic role in blocking the route to Jerusalem and in attacking and bombarding both Jerusalem itself and convoys driving to and from Jerusalem.

In the 1949 Jordan-Israel armistice agreement, which terminated the hostilities but left the issue of "territorial settlements or boundary lines" open for future peace negotiations, the Latrun area, including what is now Canada Park, was determined as "No-Man's Land" and a demilitarized zone between the forward lines of the forces, with strict limitations on any military presence or activity therein, and remained so until the 1967 Six Day War.

The armistice demarcation line has never been considered to be a border and has never been so designated by United Nations agencies or governments, including Canada.

Canada Park preserves the area's natural and historic character, including remnants from the Hasmonean and Second Temple periods. FILE PHOTOS

During the course of the Six Day War, in which Jordan, despite Israeli pleas not to do so, attacked Israel, the area fell under Israel's control and administration, together with the other West Bank areas of Judea and Samaria. In light of its strategic location commanding the main route to Jerusalem and the vital security implications involved, and in accordance with Israel's rights pursuant to the rules of armed conflict, the area was declared by Israel to be a closed military area under strict military control, and the presence of the few civilians who remained after the majority had chosen to leave was prohibited.

Since then, as part of its ongoing administration of the area, Israel has undertaken to observe the relevant norms of international humanitarian law, pending a final peace agreement and ultimate disposition of the territory. Any claims that Israel has annexed the area are without any basis. By the same token, any Palestinian claims that this area is part of a Palestinian state is utterly wrong.

This area, together with all other areas that fell under Israel's control in 1967, are the subject of the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiation process pursuant to the 1993-95 Oslo accords signed by the Palestinian leadership and Israel, and endorsed and witnessed by the major powers and regional and international organizations.

Therefore the legal status of the area – including the area in which Canada Park is located – is pending negotiation. It cannot be denominated as "Palestinian territory," since the Palestinians themselves are committed to negotiating the permanent status of the area with Israel. It is therefore governed by the special regime agreed upon by the Palestinians and Israel under the Oslo accords.

In this framework, the Palestinians have agreed that Israel continues to maintain full territorial control and jurisdiction over "Area C," in which Canada Park is located, subject to the outcome of the negotiations on permanent status of the territory. Negotiations will presumably cover the fate of the area in question.

As such, any claim that Israel's administration of Canada Park is in violation of the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention has no basis in fact or law, since the convention is not applicable.

The area of Canada Park contains remnants of Jewish Hasmonean and Second Temple presence, including burial caves and ritual baths, as well as of Roman and Crusader antiquities from later periods. Clearly, once the negotiations on the permanent status of the areas are resumed, such historic considerations will be part and parcel of the respective claims of the parties.

Maintaining the area as a park in which its natural and historic character, integrity and heritage are preserved and protected, falls squarely within the requirements of international humanitarian law and cannot in any way be described as a violation of the Geneva Convention.

Therefore any claim that Canada Park is in any way a violation of international law has no absolutely legal basis and is an utter misconception. ■

Alan Baker served as the legal adviser to Israel's Foreign Ministry and Israel's ambassador to Canada (2004-08). He participated in all the negotiations between Israel and its neighbours on the drafting of the various peace treaties and other agreements. He is currently director of the Institute for Contemporary Affairs at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

The complicated halachahs of getting high

As the marijuana legalization movement gains steam, where does the Jewish community stand?

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

It's the end of a long workday and Erez (not his real name) meets me at an uptown Toronto subway station.

We drive to a nearby park, making conversation about work, family and, eventually, about pot.

"My stuff is really good," he tells me, indicating the rolled joint tucked behind his ear.

Erez, 32, is soft-spoken, with an air of quiet intelligence.

He was raised in a traditional Jewish household in Toronto and brought up to be kosher and shomer Shabbat. His family belonged to an Orthodox synagogue and after high school, he attended yeshiva.

There, he said, pot was fairly prevalent.

"I think drugs of all kinds are everywhere," Erez shrugged.

He continues to identify as religious, observing Shabbat and kashrut and donning tfillin each morning before davening.

He has a stable job, is a burgeoning business owner and smokes pot daily – always after work, but never on Shabbat.

"I think marijuana enables one to become slightly more compassionate, more sensitive and accepting, characteristics that line up with Judaism," Erez said thoughtfully when I asked if his weed habit interferes with his commitment to Jewish observance.

While the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), the North American rabbinical association affiliated with modern Orthodoxy, hasn't taken an official position on marijuana use, the RCA's executive vice-president, Rabbi Mark Dratch, said it's safe to assume many of his contemporaries support smoking marijuana for medical reasons.

As for recreational smoking, he said, "our concern has mostly been figuring out how to provide pastoral support to people with addictions, but I imagine, as marijuana becomes more legalized and available, we'll have to make a public statement about it."

He subsequently noted that becoming intoxicated or "artificially creating an altered state of consciousness," wouldn't be endorsed by the RCA.

Neither the Rabbinical Assembly, which is the international association of Conservative rabbis, nor Reform's Central Conference of American Rabbis have taken official positions on recreational marijuana smoking, though as early as 2001, it urged its member rabbis to "become better informed about the medicinal use of marijuana and its constituent compounds" and to "urge elected officials to support legislation to reclassify marijuana as a prescribed controlled substance so that it can be used to conduct research and prescribed for critically ill patients with intractable pain and other conditions." And in 2003, the Union for Reform Judaism, the denomination's umbrella group, resolved to urge elected U.S. officials to support legislation permitting medical usage.

Still, the growing social acceptance of marijuana in Canada – in June, the Canadian Supreme Court ruled that all forms of medical marijuana are legal for those with a license, and federal Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau has called for overall legalization – makes particularly topical questions of where the Jewish community's leadership lands on the subject.

Specifically, does smoking pot recreationally violate Jewish law?

And for Jews that smoke, can it be a tool to enhance spirituality or connection with ritual and community?

Several Canadian rabbis from various denominations were contacted to comment for this article – including Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist – but most declined, saying they didn't feel sufficiently knowledgeable about the health effects of marijuana or the legal nuances surrounding it.

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of Beit Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, an Orthodox shul, invoked the Halachah dina d'malchuta dina – the law of the country is binding – as evidence that smoking recreationally is prohibited by Jewish law, so long as Canadian law deems it illicit.

Still, he acknowledged that the government's classification of harmful substances is subject to change.

As with cigarettes, he said, "society doesn't always get it right, but... we have to make decisions based on society's [current] understanding of how substances interact with our bodies."

He also noted that smoking weed might violate the command, "Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves" (Deuteronomy 4:15) – meaning that one must guard one's body from physical harm.

Further, using a substance to the point that it impedes one's ability to pray is halachically prohibited.

He referenced Purim, when the obligation to get drunk is tempered by warnings about not getting so intoxicated that one can't properly pray or say grace after meals.

A big thank you from Israel

Gil Troy

A few weeks ago, my family hosted a delegation from CIJA, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, for Friday night dinner at our home in Jerusalem. The day began (way too early), as the sun rose over the Kinneret, the Sea of Galilee, where we had gone camping with close friends to mark the end of summer vacation. The day ended on our porch, with a magical Shabbat dinner under the stars, as we enjoyed Jerusalem's cool-but-not-by-Canadian-standards night air by eating outside.

Our family friends, Israelis who have never visited North America, were fascinated by the dinner guests we were rushing home to host. They could not believe that serious, important, busy people would be devoting a week or so of their lives to come to Israel on a kind of work-mission voluntarily. They were further amazed when we told them that some of these people had come on multiple visits before and that these missions of support, solidarity, and enlightenment were fun and meaningful.

Talking to our friends, I realized that most Israelis have no idea about the vast infrastructure of pro-Israel support and engagement in Canada, the United States and elsewhere. The newspapers are filled with stories of anti-Israel boycotts and berating, of divestment and denouncements. Most Israelis understand that Jewish people across the world support them, but they don't quite understand what shape that support takes, how intensive a commitment that can be, and how many non-Jews are equally invested and engaged in not just defending Israel, but celebrating it. Given that so many are unaware, they rarely say thank you.

So, as this new Jewish year begins, in the name of my amazed, impressed and appreciative friends, and in the name of all 8.4 million Israelis who benefit from the good works of so many volunteers and donors in Canada and throughout the world, allow me to say todah rabah, thank you very, very much.

Thank you to organizations like CIJA that do so much to advocate for Israel,

> Most Israelis have no idea about the vast infrastructure of pro Israel support ... in Canada and elsewhere educate about Israel, and nurture the strong bond between Israel and Canada that has intensified in the last few years. We salute Prime Minister Stephen Harper's unwavering support for Israel and note how anxious his campaign rivals are to insist that they are equally supportive of Israel (even as we wish that NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair's ardent support for Israel was applauded by all his NDP colleagues as a mark of great insight rather than a lapse in good judgment).

We say thank you to the Jewish Federations of North America, mind-blowing do-gooding, fundraising and life-affirming organizations in the United States and Canada that do so much to bring alive the Jewish values of community, generosity, justice and mutual responsibility. In Israel, fundraising, especially for the poor, is often more personal, more informal, more local. The vast, volunteer-fuelled federation philanthropic structure does a great job of taking care of Jewish communal needs both at home and at home – meaning within local communities and in Israel.

We say thank you to the more specific organizations supporting Israeli universities, renewing Jerusalem, helping lone soldiers, healing the wounded, advancing science, and on and on. Federation gifts are important for making a broad statement about supporting communal endeavours. More tailored gifts are important expressions of individual interest and engagement.

Finally, we say thank you to basic educational and identity-building organizations, synagogues, Jewish day schools, Jewish camps and Birthright Israel, which both embody the interweaving of the Jewish People's destiny with Israel and prepare the next generation to inherit the mantle of leadership, of investing, of giving, of living large in the truest, Jewish sense of the word, by helping others near and far, not by indulging yourself.

Remembering our grandfather's sukkah

Sara Horowitz

In the middle of a poem titled Ha-yehudim – The Jews – the Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai gives a mini-course in the nature of Jewish memory. "A Jewish man remembers the sukkah in his grandfather's home./ And the sukkah remembers for him." Poised on the edge of nostalgia, we expect the poem to describe a childhood memory, long-ago festival celebrations and beloved grandparents. Instead, the poem plunges into the complexity of the Jewish experience. Meditating on what it is that "the sukkah remembers" for the unnamed Jewish man, the poem lists an enchainment of events, objects and sensations, each of which works as a memory-trigger for the next: desert wanderings, covenantal tablets, the Golden Calf, thirst, hunger and Egypt.

At first reading, it seems that Amichai is simply describing an example of how rituals and ritual objects function as symbols – evoking iconic moments in the shared Jewish past. The sukkah points to the temporary dwellings of the Israelite journey from the slavery of Egypt to the freedom of home, much as the objects on the Passover seder plate suggest other aspects of slavery and freedom. In participating in the ritual, we actively claim the memory and all that is attached to it.

But the "Jewish man" in Amichai's poem is sorting through a complicated – one might even say strained – relationship to the Jewish past. He recollects his grandfather's sukkah, but does not have one of his own. And rather than reminding this man of the collective Jewish past, the sukkah simply does the remembering for him. The phrase that is rendered in translation as "the sukkah remembers for him" reads, in the original Hebrew, vehasukkah zocheret bimkomo – the sukkah remembers in his place, or in his stead.

It is not an accident, I think, that the poem uses the sukkah to negotiate the tensions in modern Jewish identity. The sukkah is, after all, a paradox itself, standing for both wilderness and shelter, for both wandering and home. It is, in a way, a mixed symbol, contradictory and in tension with itself.

For us, rooted in permanence and the solidity of our homes, the sukkah pulls us a bit into wilderness. What does wilderness mean? Even in the densely populated cities of Canada, we can feel the freshness and also the scariness of the wilderness. In the urban forest of Toronto, for example, roam raccoons, coyotes, skunks and foxes. My suburban nephew sighted wild turkeys and a family of bears on his property. The night noises that troubled the sleep of our ancestors in flimsier dwellings than ours has the power to unsettle us, as well.

In Judaism, as in many cultures, wilderness becomes a potent metaphor for encountering something difficult and profound: facing oneself, facing deep truths, facing one's demons, facing the Divine. Prophets, seers or ordinary folks in quest of something gravitate away from the familiar, the domestic and the protected. They enter into the desert wilderness and come out changed.

Even in our cities and in the midst of community, Sukkot draws us out into the wilderness – but immediately domesticates it. Or, to put it a different way, Sukkot creates a new kind of domestic space where the wilderness cannot be kept out. It reminds us that from time to time, at certain junctures in one's life, one removes oneself from the ordinary, peeling back the social layers, to experience one's existential aloneness. But this is not the kind of existence that can be sustained – nor should it be. In Judaism, the desert wilderness is not a place to remain. Human life is to be lived among others, with family, friends, community.

In Amichai's poem, "The Jews" are defined by the bonds of family and shared history. Fragile and impermanent like human memory, the grandfather's sukkah nonetheless insists on being remembered, and on remembering. ■

Why Jews should vote for the Tories

Michael Taube

It should be no surprise to hear that I'll be voting for Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the Tories in the upcoming federal election.

Let's explore three significant reasons why you should, too.

First, the Tories support small "c" conservative principles. This includes a firm belief in small government, lower personal and corporate tax rates, more individual rights and freedoms, and trade liberalization.

In fairness, they haven't been perfect. The Tories' lack of commitment, at times, to fiscal conservatism has been worrisome.

We clearly need broad-based tax relief for all Canadians and not targeted tax cuts. Meanwhile, we need less emphasis on ineffective infrastructure projects and more focus on removing foreign ownership restrictions and promoting an open skies policy, among other things.

Then again, considering Canada's disgraceful historical attachment to backward left-wing philosophies like nanny statism and wasteful spending on bloated social services, the Tory platform (warts and all) has been a step in the right direction.

Second, the Tories prudently managed the local economy for many years.

The late finance minister Jim Flaherty balanced a large deficit with a significant stimulus package during the 2008 global economic crisis. This strategy enabled Canadian banks to avoid a liquidity crisis, and protected our economy. And by keeping income tax rates in check and wisely avoiding the introduction of more state-run programs, our nation stayed comfortably afloat.

Flaherty's strategy made Canada the envy of G20 nations. We earned praise from many corners, including former U.S. treasury secretary Henry Paulson (Republican) and current Treasury Secretary Jack Lew (Democrat).

But what about the recession we're currently in?

Besides the fact the Canadian economy was in the black for much longer than most democratic countries, it's not entirely clear we're in one. Some experts have argued it's a "technical" recession at best.

Why? Canada has experienced solid job increases rather than high unemployment levels during two consecutive quarters of negative economic growth. Meanwhile, our GDP, which only went down 0.1 per cent in the second quarter, has rebounded with an increase of 0.5 per cent in June.

To put it another way, we may already be out of this short-term "recession" that we may never had been in in the first place.

As confusing as that may sound, one thing is clear: Tory economic policies prevented us from entering a long-term recession that other western nations faced in recent years. This seems to prove the Tories took the correct route to financial stability and success.

Third, the Tories endorse a robust foreign policy agenda.

Harper has turned our country into a respected leader, rather than a ragtag follower, during international wars, minor skirmishes and humanitarian efforts. This includes aiding Afghanistan, the war against ISIS, the Russia-Ukraine conflict, and strong support for Israel.

The fact that Canada, a middle-power country, has achieved this type of success on the international stage is something we should all respect and admire.

Critics have naturally lamented the fact that Canada's traditional peacekeeping role has fallen by the wayside in the Harper era. Putting those crocodile tears aside, they've also spent a great deal of time and energy on the Tories-Israel connection.

In particular, the Jewish left continually perpetuates the myth that the party's position on Israel is the only plausible explanation as to why 52 per cent of this religious community voted Tory in the 2011 federal election. They refuse to acknowledge that Jews aren't single-issue voters, can think for themselves, and have gradually become more politically and economically conservative. They also can't accept the fact that Israel plays a minor, and not a major, role in Jewish Canadian voting patterns.

Let the naysayers build their progressive utopia with a flimsy deck of playing cards. Harper and the Tories remain the best choice for Jews – and all Canadians. They deserve your vote on Oct. 19. ■

Political differences are no longer unzera – between us

Bernie Farber

With the dissolution of organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the weakening of other groups like B'nai Brith Canada, the once open-hearted Canadian Jewish community has retrenched. Eschewing progressive initiatives of the past, where the fight for human and civil rights was paramount, today, legitimate concern about the security of the State of Israel has become the sole focus. As a result, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, with his strong support for the Jewish state, has successfully used this fear as a wedge and helped cement a shift in Jewish voting patterns, moving them rightward.

To be clear, all three political leaders support the State of Israel. And there are many Canadian Jews who identify as progressive Zionists and remain fully engaged with the Jewish state. However, this isn't the same as supporting the present Likud party. Yet today, support for Israel is being portrayed by many as support for Israeli government policy, even if progressive Canadian Jews disagree with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's vision.

This issue has divided the community like no other, especially as we head toward a federal election. Don't get me wrong: politics and Jews have always had a love/hate relationship. For decades, Jews relished arguments of any political nature. Indeed, during the heyday of CJC, shouting matches between community leaders on the left and right were commonplace, but they were always kept unzera, amongst ourselves.

Harper has cleverly changed that channel. Today, Jews who are seen as not supporting Harper are publicly shamed to a point that many prefer silence than to engage in political discussion. After all, to be labelled a Jew who is anti-Israel for refusing to support the Tory government is a badge few want to wear.

Recently a Montreal Gazette opinion piece written by an admitted Jewish Liberal lamented the fact he was being treated as a "one-issue" voter. Many Jews, I believe, silently share his concerns.

Yet our Jewish neighbours to the south seem to struggle less with the use of Israel as a divisive community wedge. In fact, the vast majority of American Jews remain Democrats, despite attempts by the American Jewish right to paint President Barack Obama as anti-Israel. Why?

The answer is at once simple and complex. In a nutshell, many American Jews have ancestors who came to North America well before the Holocaust and were, therefore, less directly affected by it, while many Canadian Jews are only one or two generations removed from the attempted genocide of the Jewish People. Thus there remains an existential angst among many Canadian Jews when it comes to the State of Israel as the last bastion of protection for the Jewish People. As a son of a Holocaust survivor, I understand, and even somewhat relate to, this fear.

Today's political antics have changed our community. Never-before-seen visceral and venomous attacks have surfaced publicly. Jewish philanthropist Barry Sherman was lambasted by a former Jewish magazine editor for having the audacity to support Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau. When the editor's fulminations were made public, the extremist Jewish Defense League shunned appeals from the mainstream Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and picketed Sherman's home during a fundraiser for Trudeau.

In the end, all of these machinations may very well have a salutary effect on the Canadian Jewish community. While there was a definite shift to the right among Jewish voters in the last election, the seeds for that shift are no longer in play. Many in the community are simply fed up with the community being used as a political pawn, which will, I believe, influence this October's vote. Remember: at least half of our community did not vote Tory in the last election.

Whichever way it goes, one thing is for certain: it's no longer business as usual for the once-progressive Jewish community. Things have changed, and while the pendulum may be swinging back, I am not sanguine about it ever reaching the same balance we once had. ■

Parents scramble as new rules force daycares to close

sshefa@thecjn.ca

After new provincial child-care regulations came into effect last month, many Jewish daycares, preschool and nursery programs that weren't in compliance with the new rules were forced to shut down – either temporarily or permanently – leaving countless parents scrambling to find spots for their kids.

The Child Care and Early Years Act replaced the Day Nurseries Act and applies to unlicensed child care, home child-care providers contracted by a licensed agency, licensed home child-care agencies, and licensed child-care centres.

Some of the new rules dictate that a provider can only care for a maximum of two children under the age of two; that a licensed home child-care provider can care for a maximum of six children under the age of 13; and that the maximum number of children applies regardless of the number of adults in the home.

Eitz Chaim Schools was one of the schools affected by the new legislation, forcing it to temporarily shut down its nursery and pre-nursery programs.

A letter to Eitz Chaim parents said administrators learned before the start of the school year that the new legislation would revoke a "grandfather clause" that permitted private schools to provide nursery school without a license.

The administrators were confident the school would qualify for a licence exemption, "on the grounds that the primary purpose of our programs is not simply 'to provide temporary care and supervision of children' (for which licenses are now required) but rather to… 'provide religious, cultural and linguistic instruction' (which programs are exempt from the license requirement)," the letter said.

Renat Keslassy and her son Aaron

But the Ministry of Education ruled Eitz Chaim didn't qualify for the exemption. The school's legal counsel advised that the ministry would likely allow it to operate with an extension while it sort things out with the province, but "to our shock and dismay, the ministry informed us that no such extension period would be provided, and that the ministry would not allow Eitz Chaim to open our nursery and pre-nursery programs without the license," the Eitz Chaim letter said.

Since the ruling, Eitz Chaim has applied for a license and is working to meet the requirements on issues such as zoning, fire code, health code, building code, insurance and specific operating policies, the administrators said.

A spokesperson said the ministry would not be able to comment on this issue by The CJN's deadline.

Eva Klein, who planned to enrol her two-year-old daughter in Eitz Chaim's nursery program, said although the situation isn't ideal, she was able to secure care for her daughter while she waits for Eitz Chaim to reopen, which the school believes will likely be after Sukkot.

"Thankfully for me, I had back up child care that has been working out, and when the license comes in after the holidays, it'll actually work out well for me, because I won't have to worry about taking her out of school for chunks of time [because of the holiday closures] and then needing to re-transition her," Klein said.

"They have one of the best nursery programs, and we're just waiting anxiously to hear that they got the green light and we can start sending our kids there."

For Renat Keslassy, currently on maternity leave, the new rules made finding daycare for her infant son very difficult. "It's hard enough as it is to find a daycare for a one-year-old. This made it way harder," she said.

After reserving a spot for her son at a Jewish home daycare in the summer, she got a call from the provider in late August.

"She said, 'These new regulations came in and I'm sorry, I can't take him anymore because I can only take two kids under two, and those people called me before you did.'"

Keslassy said she looked into the home daycare that cared for her older son when he was an infant. "She said she would hold a spot for me… She called me a few days later and she said, 'Oh my God, I don't even know what's happening, I can't even take him. I don't know what I'm going to do now. I've been doing this for 20 years, and now all of a sudden I don't know what I'm going to do.'"

Keslassy said she eventually found a daycare centre that accepted her son and is in compliance with the new regulations.

Sarah Binder, director of Gan Sameach preschool, which operates out of the Shomrei Shabbos Chevrah Mishnayos Congregation in Toronto, said the school was not licensed, so she decided to close until it went through the application process.

Binder said she's in the process of applying, but doesn't know when she'll be able to reopen. "If [the ministry] comes in and they like what they see, they could give me a provisional licence, and we could operate while heading toward the real licence," she said.

"I know of a lot of home daycares – at least 10 – that shut down out of choice. A significant amount of kids were left with nothing."

She said Gan Sameach served 40 kids in two classes – one with two- to three-year-olds, the other with three- to four-year-olds.

Binder said she knew the changes were coming, "but the problem is we were already operating. We couldn't shut down while we were operating already. We had to wait for the new school year and take care of it then. We weren't sure if everyone would close down and have to start again. I thought maybe I could go through the process while operating, but our lawyer advised us not to do that."

She said many parents have opted to arrange for home child care with an unlicensed provider who is permitted to care for five children at once.

"Some people are just waiting at home for [Gan Sameach] to re-open. They may have nannies or they're not working." ■

Canada's ties with Israel tops B'nai Brith survey results

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Canada's relationship with Israel was the most important election issue named by respondents in an "Impact Survey" released last week by B'nai Brith Canada.

Respondents were given a choice of several issues to rate as their most important. Twenty-four per cent ranked "Canada's relationship with Israel" number 1, followed by "jobs and the economy" (21 per cent), "hate-related activity, anti-Semitism and terrorism" (19 per cent), "Iran" (14 per cent), "the anti-Israel boycott and sanctions movement" (eight per cent), "affordable housing and poverty issues" (six per cent), and support for community programming and active living" (one per cent). Seven per cent of respondents chose "other."

A second question asked participants to rank their second-most-important election issue. One-quarter said "hate activity and anti-Semitism" followed by "jobs and the economy (22 per cent) and "Iran" (15 per cent).

The survey was conducted on the B'nai Brith Impact website from Aug. 2 to 12 and was open to B'nai Brith members and the general public. Approximately 500 people took part in the survey, which was promoted via Facebook, an email list and word of mouth. The system tracked respondents' IP addresses, so the poll could not be taken more than once from the same address.

The cover of B'nai Brith's election guide

Breaking down the survey participation further, respondents were heavily skewed to males (59 per cent) and were part of an older demographic. Eighty-four per cent of participants were 51 and over, while 60 per cent hailed from Ontario, 13 per cent from Quebec, 10 per cent from British Columbia and nine per cent from Manitoba.

"The survey is representative of B'nai Brith supporters and not the general Canadian population," explained B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn.

"B'nai Brith was not looking for a statistically representative sample. One could assume that the numbers weigh toward Ontario due to the fact that the majority of Canadian Jewry resides in that province," he added. "We found it interesting that the majority of respondents were from a demographic over 50 years of age, however, it is generally the case that younger Canadians are less interested in the political process."

Participants were not asked to indicate their party preferences or which leader would make the best prime minster, Mostyn said.

"As a non-partisan organization, our questions focused on discovering the issues that matter most to the community to inform our own advocacy efforts. As the grassroots voice of the community, the only way we can effectively advocate for the community we represent is to constantly dialogue with our base," he added.

In addition to surveying community members about their election priorities, B'nai Brith is hosting election debates. One was scheduled for Sept. 21 at Beth Torah Congregation and featured the main party candidates in Eglinton-Lawrence.

Others are being held Sept. 30 in the ridings of Thornhill, at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, and Winnipeg South-Centre, at the Asper Jewish Community Campus on, and in York Centre on Oct. 1 at Adath Israel Congregation.

"There is good reason why B'nai Brith has always shown leadership in hosting local riding debates in Canada," Mostyn said.

"B'nai Brith is at the forefront on a daily basis in dealing with many of the top areas of concern to the community." ■

Now is the time to get engaged in the federal election

Jonathan Bloomberg and Mark Waldman

The 2015 federal election is well underway, and while casting a vote on Oct. 19 is very important, there is more that can and should be done. It is vital that our community – the Jewish and pro-Israel community – engage further in the democratic process by volunteering.

Why? The answer comes down to two main reasons: demographics and geography. Demographically speaking, the Jewish population represents just over one per cent of the total Canadian population. There are also only a handful of ridings where there is a strong community presence – only three per cent of the total number of 338.

This means that in order for the Jewish and pro-Israel community to make an impact beyond its numbers, we need to be strategic and get engaged in record numbers.

This is where the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) can help. We are a multi-partisan organization whose mandate is to encourage community members to get involved in the democratic process by volunteering with the candidate or campaign of their choice.

Volunteers are hard to come by, which means that showing up can make a significant difference – even a few hours will go a long way. When political pundits talk about a campaign having a good "ground game," they are referring to the deployment of volunteers and their ability to drive their supporters to the polling booth. You can singlehandedly impact the outcome in a close race.

As a small community, we have the biggest impact by volunteering not only for our friends in local ridings but also in ridings where our community does not have much of a presence, where there are close races, and with friends in all parties. CJPAC can help by connecting community members with campaigns across the country. There is so much ground to cover.

We have been extremely fortunate that all three major political parties in Canada have shown support for both Israel and the Jewish community. Still, we cannot become complacent. We must remain active in the political arena, and volunteering is an excellent way to build key relationships.

> You can singlehandedly impact the outcome in a close race

Campaigns desperately need people for all kinds of tasks, so wherever your strengths lie, you can be sure there is a role for you. Volunteers will make phone calls on behalf of candidates to track support, canvass neighbourhoods and knock on doors, hand out literature on the street or at front doors, put up candidates' signs, drive voters to polling stations on election day and perform other tasks crucial to their campaign team's success. On election day, volunteers help "get out the vote" and work as scrutineers.

Our community has a long history of political engagement and this election should be no exception. It is part of our civic duty – as Canadians and as Jews – to get involved.

During the 2011 federal election, CJPAC helped connect 900 volunteers with political campaigns across the country and in all major political parties. By becoming a volunteer and working with us to connect with the candidate or campaign of your choice, you can help not only our democracy, but also our community, ensuring that we have a large impact on Oct. 19 and beyond.

For more information on how to make your mark this election, please visit our new election website itsup2you.ca, or contact us at volunteer@cjpac.ca or 1-866-929-9552.

We look forward to seeing you all on the campaign trail in the weeks to come. ■

Jonathan Bloomberg is the chair of CJPAC. Mark Waldman is the executive director of CJPAC.

A national icon takes his leave

Daniel Wolgelerenter

One of the questions I posed in this space a few weeks ago was: who will be the next big-name Jewish MP?

With apologies to Joe Oliver, Canada's first Jewish federal finance minister, what I may subconsciously have been asking is who will be the next Irwin Cotler, now that the 75-year-old Mount Royal Liberal MP is retiring from politics after a 16-year run.

It's not an entirely fair question, really, because it's nearly impossible to measure up to a national icon.

With his naturally menschlich demeanour and his long list of achievements before entering politics, Cotler has been a staple of public life in Canada and internationally for more than 40 years.

Whether as a distinguished professor of international law at McGill, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, a messenger who helped kick-start peace between Egypt and Israel, an advocate for Soviet Jewry in the 1970s and 1980s, or representing such high-profile political prisoners as Natan Sharansky and Nelson Mandela, Cotler has been a constant.

So active has he been in public life that many of us at this newspaper have often joked that the C in CJN stands for "Cotler," because he makes news, and always for honourable reasons.

In many ways, he's a Canadian version of Alan Dershowitz, who studied with Cotler at Yale in the 1960s and worked with him to help free Mandela in South Africa, among their many collaborations.

Both Cotler and Dershowitz are true small-l liberals and law professors, but while Dershowitz is a quintessentially American street brawling New Yawker, Cotler is kinder and gentler, though equally committed to his ideals, which include being a strong defender of human rights and of Israel, as well as a foe of terror-exporting countries such as Iran.

Which brings us to another theme I've been discussing since the start of the campaign: the steep decline in civility in Canadian political life. The same has happened to political discussion in the Jewish community, where divisiveness now rules the day.

Cotler, who is both strongly pro-Israel and politically left of centre, has steadfastly resisted this trend, and he demonstrates, with his signature eloquence, that Israel and Zionism aren't simply right-wing talking points.

As well, in an age of pithy sound bites meant to cut down political opponents, Cotler makes his points respectfully – and often in long paragraphs, to the chagrin of journalists who cover him.

This reluctant politician – who, in what's become political legend, only agreed to run in the Montreal riding of Mount Royal at the urging of his wife and his congregational rabbi – is a throwback to a time when politics were more collegial and less partisan.

He has worked with and maintained the respect of colleagues across party lines. Indeed, he famously had a strong working relationship with former Conservative cabinet stalwart John Baird, who considered Cotler a friend and whom Cotler has said was an excellent foreign minister.

Cotler has maintained his genteel disposition even when his opponents haven't always returned the favour.

He refused to make it a political issue when he was barred from a Tory-hosted charity event in Israel during Prime Minister's Stephen Harper's January 2014 trip.

He was a bit more vocal in 2009, when the Tories falsely suggested he had attended the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, which descended into raw anti-Semitism. And in 2011, he (perhaps too) politely asked the Conservatives to "cease and desist" when they made misleading calls about him to constituents in his riding, saying he was planning to retire.

Sadly, in the current polarized political climate, there doesn't seem to be another Cotler on the horizon.

But perhaps with him as a model, someone else can aspire to his mantle.

Meanwhile, in the spirit of hakarat hatov, we should thank him for all he has done for his country and for the Jewish community.

And let's hope he's not entirely finished doing his good work just yet. ■

All You Need to Know about the Jewish High Holidays

The Jewish festivals are more than food and family gatherings. They are both spiritually profound, and more relevant to our lives today than most people realize.

The Jewish festivals are a trajectory of the nation's destiny, a cardiogram of our joint heartbeat. The symbols of the Jewish festivals convey information that otherwise would be lost in the labyrinth of history or distorted beyond recognition. But our festivals deliver messages not only about our past, but also about our present and future.

Where It All Began

The first in line of the fall Jewish festivals is the Jewish New Year, Rosh Hashanah (Head (Beginning) of the Year). It denotes a spiritual awakening. The festival marks the moment when a person senses an aspiration to discover the meaning of life

Adam (Eve's husband and briefly a resident of the Garden of Eden), was the first person to contemplate life's meaning. We mark the day when he began to think about it as the beginning of the year, the beginning of the Jewish calendar, known as Rosh Hashanah.

In other words, Rosh Hashanah is not just a day on the calendar; it is a milestone of spiritual development. On this day we report to ourselves how we fared spiritually during the previous year, and seek to make corrections for the future.

Understanding the Symbols

Rosh Hashanah symbolizes our aspiration to higher values, benevolence, sharing, and caring for each other. The essence of Judaism is unity and brotherly love, expressed in the sayings, "That which you hate, do not do to your friend," and "Love your neighbor as yourself." The tradition to eat a fish's head symbolizes our decision to be at the forefront, leading ourselves and others toward unity.

The pomegranate, with its numerous juicy seeds, reminds us that we, too, are as seeds, and that it is time for us to ripen spiritually through unity. The seeds also represent our egoistic desires, which we must enjoy in a more balanced way, where we realize our aspirations through contribution to society.

The Rosh Hashanah apple symbolizes the primordial "transgression" of disunity. We dip it in honey to symbolize its sweetening (correction) through our reestablished unity. To achieve this unity and rekindle our brotherly love, we have to rise above our egoism and balance it by establishing among us positive connections.

A Day of Atonement

Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, follows Rosh Hashanah. On this day, we fast and pray for our correction. One of the most meaningful parts of the day is the reading of the Book of Jonah. It is with good reason that this part of the Yom Kippur service is so significant. The Hollywood-style storyline of the book contains a message that if heeded, can lift humanity from the global sludge we seem to be submerged in and brighten our future.

In the story, God commanded Jonah to help the residents of the city of Nineveh reform their ways, meaning reestablish positive relationships among them.

Abraham the patriarch tried to do the same in Babylon. When the majority of Babylonian rejected his novel ideas, he took those who were willing to unite and founded with them the Jewish nation.

Here is what acclaimed historian, Paul Bede Johnson, had to say about Abraham specifically, and the Jews in general, in his book, The History of the Jews: "What would have happened to the human race if Abraham had … kept his higher notions to himself, and no specific Jewish people had come into being? Certainly the world without the Jews would have been a radically different place. …To [the Jews] we owe the idea of equality before the law…; of the sanctity of life and the dignity of the human person; of the individual conscience…; of the collective conscience, and so of social responsibility; of peace as an abstract ideal and love as the foundation of justice, and many other items that constitute the basic moral furniture of the human mind."

Today the entire world needs collective conscience and social responsibility, but these ideas seem utterly unreal. At the time, they also seemed unreal to Jonah. So instead of attempting what Abraham had attempted, he took off in a ship and tried to forgo his task. But as we know, God found him, took him for a punitive ride in a fish's belly, and he repented and carried out his assignment.

Like Jonah, we are trying to waive our mission. We believe it is too difficult, too unpopular, and generally unappealing to be the world's emissaries for the message of love of others and mutual responsibility. But like Jonah, we will not be able to avoid our destiny. We are obliged to establish a society that practices these noble values, and sets an example for others to follow. It is the essence of our being "a light for the nations."

We All Are All On One Boat

"In our interconnected world, we are all on one boat. Any thought of decoupling is a mirage," said Christine Lagarde, head of the International Monetary Fund (IMF). She was right. And just as the sailors on Jonah's boat discovered that he was guilty of their peril, the world is pointing a blaming finger at us, Jews, for the stormy seas our global ship is sailing nowadays. As Jonah eventually took on his mission, we must take it on ourselves to unite so as to provide a model of a practical method for uniting. This is our obligation to humanity today, and the sooner we achieve it, the better it is for us and for the world.

Happy New Year!

Chabad builds new B.C. centre

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

As Rosh Hashanah approached, Chani Kaplan was busy catering for New Year's meals for 250 on Vancouver Island, all prepared out of her small home kitchen.

She and Rabbi Meir Kaplan, who head up the Chabad Centre for Jewish Life and Learning on Vancouver Island, are praying that by next year at this time, their brand new 10,000-square-foot building at 2955 Glasgow St. in Victoria will be up and running. It would be, they say, the first new shul in Victoria in 150 years.

"We need a permanent place for Chabad on the island," Rabbi Kaplan said. "We've been serving the community for 12 years, and we need the stability of a permanent space, with a commercial kitchen, a new mikvah and classrooms for preschool, Hebrew school and adult learning."

For now, Chabad is in a temporary location in downtown Victoria, where it draws hundreds of families for events and services and has a mailing list of 1,000 families, Rabbi Kaplan said.

Chabad's preschool is already open, with 30 kids.

"This is not a question of build it and they will come," Rabbi Kaplan said. "They're here. Now we need to build it."

Fundraising efforts for the new Chabad Centre started two years ago, and so far $1.5 million has been raised, and the land for the site has been paid for. Rabbi Kaplan plans to raise the remaining $2 million on the island and hopes some support from outside Vancouver Island will be forthcoming, too.

He's also hoping the new building will receive matching government grants to cover security cameras.

If everything goes according to plan, construction will begin next month and be completed by next August, which means Rosh Hashanah services next year would be held in a newly opened building.

Late last month, some 250 people attended a groundbreaking ceremony, including Victoria Mayor Lisa Helps and other local politicians and MLAs, such as Green party Leader Elizabeth May, NDP MPs Murray Rankin and Randall Garrison and NDP MLA Gary Holman.

The new building will be centrally located, both for those who live in Victoria and those on the island's outskirts.

"It's next to one of the biggest parks in the area, with a playground for kids and a soccer field," he added. "That will be a tremendous asset for summer camps and Hebrew school, to have this amazing outdoor space adjacent to our building."

Leon Zetler, owner of Aubergine Specialty Foods in Victoria, was among the donors and is one of the founding members of the centre. "Chabad has brought many fantastic benefits to Vancouver Island, and investing in Chabad is, in my mind, investing in our Jewish values and our future. The centre will be with us for the rest of our lives, and I strongly encourage other Jewish folks on the island to donate to this wonderful cause."

JODIE SHUPAC

Canadians face a choice about which historical narrative they'd prefer to look back on: being part of a country that closes its doors to people in need, or being part of one that welcomes them, Naomi Alboim, chair of the Policy Forum at Queen's University School of Policy Studies, told a roomful of Jewish individuals and organizational leaders Sept. 16.

Alboim, who was head of federal refugee resettlement programs in Ontario during the Indochinese boat people crisis in 1979 and more recently was one of the founders of the organization Lifeline Syria, spoke at an information session hosted by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) to brief the Jewish community on JIAS Toronto's role in addressing the Syrian refugee crisis.

Held at the Lipa Green Centre and attended by more than 100 people, the event was intended to give members of the community interested in sponsoring a Syrian refugee family or donating time or money to the cause a step-by-step breakdown of how to proceed.

Attendees included representatives from synagogues and groups such as Beth Tzedec Congregation and the Danforth Jewish Circle.

Janis Roth, executive director of JIAS Toronto, told the crowd the organization called the meeting in response to the inundation of calls it has received from people asking what JIAS Toronto is planning to do and how they can help.

"We as Jews understand what it means to be refugees," Alboim said, explaining that 11 million Syrians have so far been displaced – seven million of them within Syria, while four million have been scattered around neighbouring countries or further afield.

The humanitarian needs are too overwhelming for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to cope with, and Canada, along with other countries, needs to step up and contribute sponsorship and resources.

"Canada alone can't solve this problem but it can be part of a global solution. Our response to date has been woefully inadequate," she added.

Lifeline Syria, which Alboim helped form in June, is a volunteer-run group whose goal is help recruit, train and support sponsoring organizations so that those sponsors can bring 1,000 Syrian refugees to the Greater Toronto Area.

Canadians' immense interest in the group and the media attention it has received have convinced its founders that they'll be able to "exceed that goal several times," said Alboim.

Lifeline Syria sees itself as a "matchmaker" that pairs sponsoring groups with refugees, but the administrative process is complex, Alboim noted, adding that the Jewish community is lucky to have JIAS Toronto working as an umbrella group to help facilitate it.

Lia Kisel, JIAS' language and settlement director, laid out what sponsoring a Syrian family will entail:

- An individual or group of people – this could range from a family or group of friends to a synagogue – comes together to form a "constituent group" (CG).
- The CG must present references and other details to JIAS Toronto, which functions as a "sponsorship agreement holder" under Citizenship and Immigration Canada.
- The CG and JIAS Toronto sign a memorandum of understanding that includes a detailed list of responsibilities that each will take on.
- The CG must secure 60 per cent of the sponsorship costs at this time (JIAS can issue tax receipts for these funds).
- JIAS Toronto then submits a detailed sponsorship application to Citizenship and Immigration Canada.
- During the six-month period following submission of the application and prior to the refugee or refugee family's arrival, the CG makes monthly payments to JIAS in order to cover the remaining 40 per cent of the total sponsorship costs.
- Upon the refugee's arrival, JIAS works with the refugee family and creates a budget with the sponsorship funds for a period of 12 months from the day of arrival and will co-ordinate additional settlement and integration efforts.

CGs will also be responsible for non-financial support to the individual or family they sponsor, Kisel stressed. This might include welcoming refugees when they arrive, helping them find housing, accompanying them to medical appointments and grocery shopping, helping them register their children in school, etc. ■

AEPi fraternity keeps people Jewish, study finds

sshefa@thecjn.ca

According to a study commissioned by Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi), the Jewish fraternity instils within its members a sense of communal responsibility, a connection to Israel, and a commitment to Jewish continuity.

Researched and conducted by Groeneman Research & Consulting in 2014, the report – titled Assessing the impact of the Alpha Epsilon Pi Experience: Findings from a 2014 survey of alumni and which has yet to be officially released – revealed that AEPi alumni are generally connected to the Jewish community at a higher rate than North American Jews in general.

Of the 1,137 AEPi alumni who were interviewed, most were under 40 and attended university from 1995 to 2010. Five per cent of those surveyed attended Canadian schools.

The survey investigated topics that included whether AEPi alumni were more likely to marry Jewish and/or raise Jewish families, the "Jewishness" of their social circle, their involvement in the Jewish community, their engagement with Israel, and religious observance.

According to the survey, "intermarriage is lower than average – and their children are being raised Jewish more than others."

Eighty per cent of AEPi alumni married Jewish compared to 57 per cent of American Jewish men, according to the PEW Research Center's 2013 survey, A Portrait of Jewish Americans.

Thirty per cent said AEPi influenced their views about marrying Jewish, and 88 per cent said their children are being raised as Jews.

"Three-quarters of alumni participated in Jewish organizations or activities besides AEPi while in college. Over half acknowledge the fraternity for facilitating this involvement," the report said.

"Four out of every five alumni have been to Israel. Almost half of all AEPi alumni had visited on a Birthright trip. Both rates surpass norms for young Jewish men in general."

Sixty four per cent of AEPi alumni donated to a Jewish non-profit or charity, compared to 54 per cent of American Jewish males in general.

Jay Feldman, managing director of AEPi's foundation, said he was not surprised by the findings.

"Anecdotally, the members talk about how their AEPi experiences had a direct impact on the strengthening of their identity, of their affiliation" Feldman said.

Jay Feldman

He said the results of the study revealed that many alumni have gone on to work, whether professionally or as volunteers in the Jewish world.

"Over the decades, the Jewish fraternity has evolved," Feldman said. "We're global, we're in seven countries, 188 campuses. In the last 10 years in particular, we've intensified our supplemental programming that we do. We do conferences and training seminars and workshops and programs.

"What we set out to do was take the four year fraternity experience and use it as a platform to enhance the Jewish identity."

Feldman said the most "gratifying" aspect of the study was the confirmation that most alumni feel a connection to Israel and place value on raising Jewish families.

"Also, there is a portion of the report where it talks about how for some people AEPi was a place where they developed and cemented deep friendships and made meaningful connections with their peers and other Jews, which is very important to us as well," Feldman said.

Although not interviewed for this survey, David Burden, a 32-year-old AEPi alumnus of York University who serves as the fraternity's regional governor for some of the Canadian chapters, is a prime example of an AEPi success story.

He married a Jewish woman, plans to raise any future children as Jews, observes Jewish holidays, is involved with other Jewish organizations and "for the most part, I live a Jewish lifestyle. I identify as a Jew and I'm very proud of that. I know that I can attribute that to my time in AEPi," Burden said.

"The real benefit of AEPi is keeping the community tight. When people go away to university, after coming from a place like [The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] where it's easy to be Jewish, as soon as you go away to university you are outside of the nest and you really have to make the decisions for yourself and [it helps to be] aligned with other Jews who are of a similar mindset," he said.

"I'm not really surprised by the results of the survey, because I am in touch with so many guys who are involved Jewishly. It's not a surprise that AEPi is keeping people Jewish. For anyone who really knows what AEPi is, it goes without saying." ■

CIJA, Jordan co-operate on refugee aid plan

plungen@thecjn.ca

As the situation in Syria continues to deteriorate, neighbouring countries have been flooded with refugees, 1.4 million in the case of Jordan alone. Amounting to 21 per cent of the country's population, the influx has taxed the resources of the desert kingdom. But Jordan may be getting relief courtesy of a Canadian Jewish organization.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is collaborating with representatives of Jordan's King Abdullah on a response that may take some of the pressure off Jordan. CIJA is working on a plan that will see Canadian faith groups and ethnic communities, representatives from the corporate world and the government of Canada raise funds to support the care of refugees in Jordan.

"These funds would be directed at ameliorating the conditions facing those displaced by the war," said CIJA chair David Cape.

Cape was part of a CIJA delegation that met with King Abdullah in Amman on Sept. 2. The meeting was also attended by Royal Court Chief Fayez Tarawneh, King's Office Director Jafar Hassan, and Canadian Ambassador Bruno Saccomani. It was part of ongoing ties dating back to 2012 and "was the normal continuation of a relationship that has developed and deepened over the years," said CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel.

The exact nature of the initiatives must still be determined, and the plan would need the approval of the Canadian government, said Cape. But, it would focus on helping the vast majority of refugees, who remain in the Middle East.

"The main point underscored by the king was that while images of refugees flooding Europe understandably move people, the true crisis is in the region and accepting a relative handful of refugees will not ameliorate the catastrophic situation facing those displaced in countries like Jordan, Lebanon and the like. That, in his view, is where our efforts should be directed and where we can be of most value in alleviating the humanitarian crisis," Cape stated.

In the two-hour discussion with King Abdullah and his senior advisers, "CIJA raised the idea of a public-private partnership in Canada that could enlist various faith and ethnic communities as well as the corporate world to raise urgently needed funds that would be matched by the Canadian government. These funds would be directed at ameliorating the conditions facing those displaced by the war," Cape said.

CIJA left the meeting pledging to "work directly with the palace in devising a plan that would then seek the approval of the Canadian government. It would then be promoted to Canadian stakeholders," Cape said.

"The notional idea is to mark the first tranche of support with a major event in Canada, at which the king would be the guest of honour. Over the longer term, the hope is that this could serve as a 'generic' model for application in other countries," he added.

Fogel has been in contact with Jordanian interlocutors since the delegation's return earlier this month. It is likely a series of face-to-face meetings will be held, some in Canada, after the federal election.

Cape said that while the proposed initiative "is directly exclusively at mitigating the humanitarian crisis in situ, most especially in Jordan," it does not preclude cases of family reunification and resettlement in Canada for Syrians continuing.

Costs for implementing the plan will come from the corporate sector, private philanthropists and foundations, as well as a public donation drive. Cape said he expects these funds would be matched by contributions from the federal government.

David Cape

As for financial support from the Jewish community, Cape said, "Many within the Jewish community have expressed a keen desire to help. For some, it will come in the form of sponsoring a refugee, for others it will be in donating to initiatives like that described above. CIJA is providing the range of information about sponsorship to communities across the country and such decisions will ultimately be taken by individuals and communities at the local level."

"While CIJA does not see this situation – tragic as it is – as analogous to the Holocaust or even pre-Holocaust experience, there is clearly a human tragedy playing out, and as Jews, we have an obligation to engage in the effort to address it effectively." ■

Mitchell Goldhar

When David slew Goliath, his task was arguably easier than the one facing Maccabi Tel Aviv. David had only to contend with a giant of a man, a cold-blooded killer, better equipped than himself and experienced at chewing up and spitting out small fry like himself.

Maccabi Tel Aviv soccer club has a much bigger task at hand. They qualified for the UEFA Champions League but have been placed in a group alongside Chelsea FC, last year's winners of England's premier league, the biggest – and arguably the most important – domestic soccer league in the world. With guys like Oscar, Falcao and Eden Hazard in the lineup, they make Goliath look like a 98-pound weakling. Bookmakers had Chelsea at 2/9 odds to defeat Maccabi, versus Maccabi's 12/1 odds of prevailing against the London side in the group's opening game. The group also includes two other top sides, Portugal's Porto and Ukraine's Dynamo Kyiv.

Still, Mitchell Goldhar is hopeful, if not particularly optimistic. As owner of Maccabi Tel Aviv, he says it's great to be playing in the group stage in the first place, where only the best of the best compete.

"We're going to have to pinch ourselves that we're on the same pitch as Chelsea," he said, prior to the first game kickoff. "We're going to have to be over-achievers. That's not unusual for Israel."

The game at Chelsea's Stamford Bridge on Sept. 16 didn't turn out so well for the Israelis. They lost 4-0, but as Goldhar sees it, the journey is as important as the destination. As long as Maccabi Tel Aviv plays hard, stays disciplined and gives it their best shot, they'll be living up to the standards he is trying to set for Maccabi.

Those are the qualities, the ethos and the culture that he has worked to instill in the team since he acquired it five years ago from fellow Torontonian, businessman Alex Shnaider, and his group of Israeli investors. Goldhar's fortune was made in real estate development. Forbes ranked him 847th among the world's billionaires.

When he acquired the team, it was already a storied franchise – Israel's premier league's dominant team. Established in 1906, it had a certain cachet, both domestically and internationally. Think of the Montreal Canadiens or the Toronto Maple Leafs in their respective heydays. For Israelis, soccer is by far the number one sport and Maccabi Tel Aviv the number one team, he explained.

But the team was losing money. And the team's culture left something to be desired. Looking at the franchise from top to bottom, Goldhar believed it needed an overhaul. He cleaned house, changing the management and bringing in Jordi Cruyff, son of famed Dutch international Johan, and a top player with Barcelona and Manchester United.

"My plan was a long-term plan," Goldhar said. "I expected to lose money for many years until I got the culture of Maccabi Tel Aviv established. I thought the way we do things was important, and the results would follow.

"I wanted to establish a culture that had a respect for the team, that no one player is bigger than the team, [that included] a proper work ethic, a high standard of training and commitment to the lifestyle of the professional soccer player.

"It was a culture that needed more discipline...and not cutting corners with regard to training, nutrition and fitness," he said.

"It's a long-term process," he continued. "Not everybody involved in soccer in Israel has the patience for tolerating such a process. For a number of years in the early stages of [my] ownership, there were lots of people who would've liked Maccabi to have better results.

"I was prepared to live with all the criticism, knowing that once it's finished, it will be built for heavy weather and be good for the long term."

He paid off all the team's debts, upgraded facilities and brought in new staff in the medical, physiotherapy, sports psychology and nutrition fields.

His approach paid off. Maccabi went on to win three consecutive Israeli Premier League titles.

With its on-field success, came financial rewards. The team earned nearly 18 million euros (around $27 million) by making it to the Champions League group stage – a significant sum for a relatively small team. And that doesn't include the money that will be earned through the sale of team merchandise or through social media and exporting the brand, Goldhar said.

For Goldhar, there are other benefits to owning the team. A long-standing supporter of Israel, he was happy to find a means of expressing his Zionism in a way that touched Israelis where they lived – through their support for the country's premier soccer team.

And then there's the even broader implications of Maccabi's success. Not only would it give Israelis, especially young people, something to be proud about, but its impact could be felt far beyond Israel's borders.

"I thought it would be good for European soccer fans to take note of this Israeli team, comprised primarily of Jews. Millions of European soccer fans would see an impressive team from Israel, which says something positive about Israel at a time when we don't always get a positive press," he said. ■

Women's shelter library gives kids a homework space

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Act To End Violence Against Women (ATEVAW), a non-profit Jewish organization that helps women and their children escape domestic abuse, recently opened a library at a Toronto women's shelter to provide the youngest victims of domestic abuse with a warm and welcoming place to read, relax and play.

The ATEVAW "Turning the Page" library project first launched in 2012 to create a space in women's shelters where children have access to resources including books, cozy furniture, computers and a comfortable work space.

Last month, Nellie's Women's Shelter in downtown Toronto became the fourth shelter in Canada to have a library installed by ATEVAW, which is the only Canadian charity installing children's libraries in shelters for abused women and their children.

Since 2012, Auberge Transition in Montreal, Women's Habitat in Etobicoke, and the Yellow Brick House in Markham have each received a Turning the Page library.

Helen Lampert, an ATEVAW board member, along with project co-chairs Elayne Shuster and Toby Zarnett, and a number of other volunteers, worked for months to design the library.

She said the retail value of all the goods and services required to put this library together would run about $15,000.

"We were able to do it for much less than that, because we got incredible donations," Lampert said.

"It takes a real village to create the library. We began with a site visit and we had a volunteer that came in. He's an engineer and he drew up the measurements. We had a design team that went to work in creating all the colour choices and mock-ups of the room. We had a donation committee that went about gathering books and furniture and lighting and computers and computer desks."

Lampert explained that shelters generally don't have the funds to allocate to something they would consider a luxury, such as a library.

"In terms of our mission, it is part of the Jewish values of repairing the world and giving back to others... and we know that literacy is a huge issue for young children who are in those kinds of situations," Lampert said.

Some books in the new library

"It's a marvellous place for the kids to be able to do their homework. They've got a computer and a printer, and they didn't have any of this before. They've got lovely, cozy furniture to sit on, and a place to read together and a little table to do puzzles and play games."

She said it was also a priority to ensure that all the books and furniture were brand new.

"For the dignity and self-worth of these kids, we want them to know that they matter and they deserve brand new books and brand new everything," Lampert said.

"One of the things I think is very special about this is that we have multiple copies of each book, so in addition to whatever is on the shelf at the library, the shelter is left with about three more copies of each book, and the idea is that when a child leaves the shelter, they can take their favourite book with them and have something to take away."

ATEVAW, which has two offices, in Vaughan and Montreal, works to support the 100,000 women and children who are forced to leave their homes each year for the safety of an emergency shelter for abused women.

ATEVAW also operates kosher women's shelters in Toronto and Montreal and offers a legal information service for Jewish women who have experienced abuse.

"Violence against women is something that is still seen in the Jewish community as a shame, and there is a conception that it doesn't exist [in the Jewish community]... I recognize really how important it is that the word of what we do gets out there and women who are in that kind of situation... can have a place to turn to." ■

CIJA welcomes Quebec animal welfare bill

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Nothing in Quebec's draft bill on animal protection would affect Jewish ritual slaughter, says the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which issued a statement on Sept. 15 welcoming the proposed legislation.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of CIJA's Canadian Rabbinic Caucus, said CIJA is not concerned at this time by media reports quoting Agriculture Minister Pierre Paradis, who introduced the bill in June, concerning the effect of the legislation on kosher or halal slaughtering techniques.

"There is nothing in the bill that explicitly or implicitly refers to kosher ritual slaughter," Rabbi Poupko told The CJN.

Canadian Press reported Paradis as saying he expects to hear concerns about kosher and halal slaughtering techniques during the three weeks of public hearings by a National Assembly committee on the bill, which began on Sept. 14.

To his knowledge, Paradis said, kosher slaughter would not break the planned law, but some Muslim practices in killing animals may.

"Slow death is not acceptable under the new legislation," he said. "That will have an impact on those who don't find the equilibrium between religious beliefs and respect for animals."

Rabbi Poupko termed those remarks "speculation," prompted by media questions.

In his formal statement on the bill, An Act to Improve the Legal Situation of Animals, Rabbi Poupko said: "We commend the government's efforts to advance animal welfare in Quebec. Animal welfare is strongly valued by the Jewish community; Judaism strictly prohibits gratuitous cruelty to animals.

"This is why Jewish ritual slaughter, or shchitah, is as quick and painless as humanly possible."

He also notes that the Animal Legal Defense Fund, in its presentation at the hearing's opening day, said that properly performed ritual slaughter is humane and does not cause undue cruelty to animals.

CIJA will submit a brief to the National Assembly committee that will explain how shchitah "conforms entirely to the objectives of Bill 54," Rabbi Poupko said.

Paradis, who hopes to get the bill passed this fall, said Quebec is "about 20 years behind the rest of the civilized world in animal protection."

Significantly, the bill recognizes animals as "sentient beings" with biological needs, rather than "movable property."

The bill would impose fines and possibly jail time on those who abuse animals. First-time violators could be fined up to $250,000, which could increase to $750,000 and 18 months in prison for repeat offences.

D'Arcy McGee Liberal David Birnbaum, the sole Jewish MNA, said: "By tabling this bill, our government is showing that it is willing to act strongly against negligence of and cruelty toward animals. I know that residents of our riding believe that humane treatment of animals is important; in fact, the city of Cote St. Luc has been a pioneer in championing such measures."

In the unlikely event that kosher slaughter was put in jeopardy, Rabbi Poupko said CIJA would "uncompromisingly" defend the practice. ■

Radio-Canada ombud upholds anti-Semitism complaint

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Radio-Canada's ombudsman says the way a caller's disparaging comments about Jews made on a TV show were handled did not comply with the public network's standards.

In a Sept. 15 report, Pierre Tourangeau responded to a complaint by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) concerning the Aug. 4 episode of La période des questions, a public affairs program on the news network ICI RDI.

CIJA initially complained about the remarks, which it considers anti-Semitic, to Radio-Canada management, and when it wasn't satisfied by the response, to the ombudsman.

Tourangeau agreed the caller's remarks were "clearly excessive and anti-Semitic." The program's host, Christine Fournier, was reproached for not objecting to the caller's comments at the time. He concluded that the responsibility to "reject certain comments [by viewers] or to underline their excessive character [is] entirely and uniquely that of those responsible for the program and the host," especially the latter.

CIJA was troubled that Fournier failed not only to interrupt the caller, or at least point out the "inflammatory" nature of her words, but commented afterward that her remarks were "interesting."

The subject of the episode was the federal election. The caller, Marie Fontaine of Quebec City, said she wanted to know if New Democratic Party leader Tom Mulcair is "pro-Zionist" and what his foreign policy is.

"If he is pro-Zionist, well, he can pack his bags and leave. We don't want people like that here," she said.

She continued more vehemently: "Our best friend, it's not [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu, madame, not at all. We should have disinfected the place when he left. When we know about all the murders happening over there... in Israel. They are stealing, just now, land from West Bank residents. What's the problem? The United States, now Canada, we are in the claws and tentacles of those people, who want to become masters of the world."

Fournier, a veteran broadcaster, thanked Lafontaine "very much" and then commented to the show's in-studio guest, Alain-G. Gagnon, a political science professor at the Université du Québec à Montreal, that the caller's remarks were "interesting."

In a letter to Radio-Canada dated Aug. 6, David Ouellette, CIJA's deputy director of Quebec public affairs, described Lafontaine's comments as "clearly excessive and anti-Semitic" and liable to incite hatred against Jews.

In particular, her opinion that Jews seek world domination is reminiscent of "Jewish conspiracies in classic anti-Semitic literature," he wrote, including The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and other propaganda that depicts Jews as "octopuses or other monstrous figures taking over the world with their tentacles and claws."

Ouellette also complained about Gagnon's references to the "Jewish lobby" and the "many financiers" attracted to the Canadian government's pro-Israel policies. He said Lafontaine is "right to be worried."

Tourangeau concluded: "Certain comments from the public heard on the program La période des questions, broadcast on ICI RDI on Aug. 4, 2015 infringed on the value of equality and the guidelines on the 'respect and absence of prejudice' of the Normes et pratiques journalistiques of Radio-Canada."

In his earlier response to the CIJA complaint, Luc Simard, Radio-Canada's director of diversity and relations with citizens, said La période des questions, which is live, is a forum for public opinion and, therefore, it would be "out of place [for the program's staff] to censure what the public says under the pretext that certain opinions displease them. Our country identifies the freedom of speech as a fundamental freedom and citizens are allowed to exercise it."

Pierre Tourangeau

> It is true that Radio-Canada must give voice to the largest possible range of opinions, but anti-Semitism is not a legitimate opinion, it's a racist belief, it is a scourge that has dogged humanity for centuries and has led to the horrors that we know

However, Simard agreed that Lafontaine's comments about Jews seeking world domination are reminiscent of classic anti-Semitism. "Our team did not have the intention of relaying these prejudices." He wrote that Lafontaine did not express anti-Semitic views when initially screened by a researcher, or she would not have been permitted to go on air.

Simard said Fournier acted correctly in ending Lafontaine's comments "after a few seconds." Simard defended Gagnon's remarks about "financiers" being attracted to Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Israel policy. He said the "Jewish lobby" is a term for groups whose "activities are documented and the effect of their actions is known."

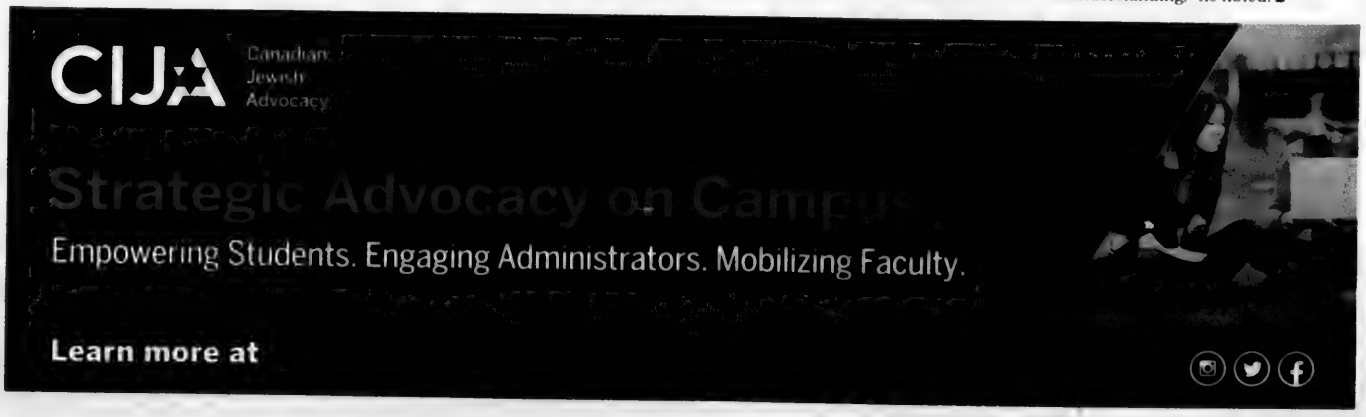
He said it was "a shame that [Lafontaine's] anti-Semitic remarks were not counterbalanced by other participants. After her intervention, 20 minutes remained in the show. The tribune was open to everyone: if someone wanted to express a contrary opinion, there is every indication that they would have had access to the line... We deplore that a voice rejecting anti-Semitism was not heard that day."

Ouellette rejected that explanation and took the complaint to the ombudsman.

Tourangeau differed with Simard that it was up to another member of the public to flag a previous caller's remarks. "It is true that Radio-Canada must give voice to the largest possible range of opinions, but anti-Semitism is not a legitimate opinion, it's a racist belief, it is a scourge that has dogged humanity for centuries and has led to... the horrors that we know."

Tourangeau said he discussed the matter with Fournier and other crew members, notably the show's director, Nathalie Demers. His impression is that no one was listening attentively when Lafontaine veered into anti-Semitism. Fournier claims she didn't fully grasp what the caller was saying.

Radio-Canada's standards prohibit stereotypes or generalizations "that feed prejudices or expose people to hate or misunderstanding," he noted. ■



Some say smoking pot helps create a sense of spirituality

He also expressed concern that marijuana could be a "gateway drug," potentially leading to a serious addiction.

But Rabbi Korobkin also noted that a number of talmudic passages refer to the benefits of using drugs in moderation.

"There's a recognition even from the biblical period that people suffer various pressures and depressions, and in order to be able to shake off some things that prevent you from fully expressing joy, it's sometimes not only permitted, but mandated, to indulge in small quantities of mind-altering drugs," he said.

Of course, he acknowledged, the Bible's references to drugs usually pertain to wine, and it's unclear whether marijuana would be similarly considered.

As for smoking to achieve spiritual connection, Rabbi Korobkin said, "I think it's conceivable that using certain substances could get you in touch with God. A lot of times people have trouble seeing beyond a rigid, three-dimensional universe, and certain substances let people see beyond the veil of the physical world."

Sam (also not his real name), 26, lives in Windsor, Ont., and describes himself as a "Sarah Silverman-type, cultural Jew."

He has a medical marijuana license because of an ongoing health condition, but said the line between smoking pot for medicinal versus recreational purposes is blurred for him.

"It's not that [smoking] creates a euphoric moment, but it contributes to an overall sense of well-being," he explained.

Further, because getting high can open up one's mind to different points of view, Sam said, it can create a sense of spirituality.

In the United States, "Jeffthe420chef" (he prefers not to use his real name) has caused something of a buzz, you might say, for catering private or special event meals infused with CBD strains of cannabis (typically used to treat medical conditions) for people with medical marijuana licenses. If an event is being held in a state where recreational smoking is legal and people are looking for a more recreational experience, he'll cook with THC-infused foods.

> It's conceivable that using certain substances could get you in touch with God.

The host provides the pot, out of which he'll make oil, and covers his travel and accommodation expenses, but he doesn't charge for cooking.

"I feel strongly about it. I believe we're only in the world a short time and must do what we can to help people," said Jeffthe420chef, explaining that he's careful when cooking with the oil to ensure nobody gets "super high."

Raised in an Orthodox home in Los Angeles, Jeffthe420chef tailors his meals to the law of the state he's cooking in and the needs of the guests.

His repertoire includes "pot Shabbats" replete with Shabbat rituals, traditional foods – his famous variations include "potzeh balls" and "cannabis challah" – and the dinners attract Jewish guests of all backgrounds, including Orthodox Jews.

"People can have a spiritual experience and bond in a way you wouldn't over just a bottle of wine," he said.

The point is not to get really stoned, but ease pain if one is suffering or simply having a heightened experience.

"When you're living day-to-day life, your ego gets in the way... but ingesting the right strain [of marijuana] takes away these barriers and you start seeing things from a whole new perspective," he said.

Erez and I sit in the park under the shade of a tree and he tells me that getting high doesn't deepen his experience of Jewish rituals, such as prayer, but neither does marijuana belong to a realm that's entirely removed from spirituality, or from God.

"Smoking sometimes stirs up emotions in me," he mused, "feelings of being grateful for where I am, and to God for putting me there." ■

Is Israel on the brink of another war with Hamas?

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSLAEM

The rocket attacks from the Gaza Strip on Sept. 18 do not seem to be part of the trickle of projectiles "landing in open areas" to which Israelis have become accustomed at a rate of once every month or two.

While it is true that – like in previous attacks this year – Gazan supporters of the Islamic State (ISIS) rushed to claim responsibility, the manner in which videos documenting the attacks were published and especially the chosen targets testify that something has changed. The launch was meant to kill.

Firing rockets at two Israeli cities, and at least one was not a crude short-range projectile, is no mean feat. While it may have been done without Hamas' awareness, the launchers knew full well that such an act would likely get them in trouble with the authorities in Gaza.

We can thus come to a different conclusion: the volleys were launched either with Hamas' tacit approval or with the terror group looking the other way, a combination of letting out steam and sending a message to Israel and Egypt that the situation in Gaza is turning quickly intolerable.

There is no solid intelligence at the moment indicating the above. But this is an assessment heard inside the Gaza Strip.

Last week saw power outages in Gaza lasting more than 20 hours a day – due to a combination of faulty lines decreasing the supply of electricity from Egypt and the closure of border crossings with Israel due to Rosh Hashanah and Shabbat, resulting in fewer fuel deliveries. As a result, unprecedented demonstrations took place against Hamas.

Last week, hundreds of Gazans flooded the streets of the central and southern parts of the Strip for four consecutive days to protest the situation. Activists from Hamas' military wing tried to use the frustration and burned posters of Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas during the protests.

Adding to the tension, last Friday Egypt flooded tunnels near Rafah, damaging vast parts of an infrastructure Hamas has built and maintained at great cost.

The poverty, distress, unemployment, power outages, poor infrastructure (despite Israel's past and present efforts to improve them) – are all coming together to make life in the Strip unbearable for the residents there.

Palestinians take part in a protest against a power crisis in Rafah in the southern Gaza Strip, on Sept. 14. For weeks, residents of Gaza, home to 1.8 million people, have been experiencing long hours of electricity outages due to fuel and power shortages. ABED RAHIM KHATIB/ FLASH90 PHOTO

> On the face of it, neither Israel nor Hamas wants an escalation

More and more voices in the top echelon of Hamas' military wing, and especially the Gaza streets, now say that the only way to make things better is another round of violence with Israel – in other words – another war. These voices are for the moment a minority, but they multiply with each passing day, within the organization and in popular opinion.

On the face of it, neither Israel nor Hamas wants an escalation. Both sides want a lasting ceasefire. The terror group continues to convey the message that it wishes to resolve the salary crisis of its officers and in return will agree to allow PA personnel to man the checkpoints. (This attitude is not new; however, the problem with the Hamas "willingness" is its insistence that Hamas security personnel stand at checkpoints alongside those from the PA.)

Israel is doing its fair share in order to calm tensions in the Gaza Strip. But we witnessed a very similar scenario only 14 months ago, on the eve of Operation Protective Edge. Then, too, neither side had a clear interest to start a war, but Hamas' political and financial distress in Gaza pushed the organization to escalate things.

This week, IDF soldiers and Hamas troops exchanged fire on the Gaza Strip border. A Hamas fighter was wounded. If the incident had ended differently, with multiple injuries on either side, it is hard to say where we would be today.

The news from East Jerusalem last week was also far from optimistic. With more rock throwing, Molotov cocktails and other scenes of violence in and around Jerusalem, tensions in the capital were the worst they have been since the murder of 16-year-old Palestinian Mohammad Abu Khdeir last July.

Israeli government spokespeople bluntly ignore Israel's part in creating the current reality in East Jerusalem and an event that, at least in part, led to the latest wave of unrest – namely Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel's decision ahead of Rosh Hashanah, to visit the Temple Mount while leading a group of right-wing activists.

The pictures of altercations on the Temple Mount were shown on every possible Arab news channel, where one can assume they inflamed public opinion in Gaza and the West Bank, and beyond.

On Sept. 18, protests took place in several locations in the West Bank. For now, these were small protests, far more minor than those seen in the days of the first intifadah or even the second one. One of the main reasons these protests do not become massive displays of frustration that can quickly devolve to chaos is the PA. The Palestinian security establishment violently dispersed two such events in Bethlehem and Jenin, both held under the banner of "identifying with al-Aqsa."

The PA used brute force against its own people, including firing live bullets at protesting gunmen. This determination should have elicited a positive response on Israel's side. But the Israeli reaction was to block the entry of Palestinian Prime Minister Rami Hamdallah, head of general intelligence Majd Faraj and head of preventive security Ziad Habrih to Jerusalem.

A simple act of Israel exerting its sovereignty, but where does this put Abbas? In the highly inconvenient position of a leader whose people are being arrested at an Israeli checkpoint when they try to reach the Temple Mount.

Attention now turns to Abbas, who has pledged to drop a political bombshell during his speech at the UN at the end of the month.

Abbas suffered a severe political blow last week after he failed to convene the Palestinian National Council and move forward with an election for the Palestinian Liberation Organization's (PLO) executive committee – elections he badly wanted.

Abbas' distress – regarding Israel and his domestic situation – only grows. Israel's problem is that because Abbas is facing internal problems, he may be looking for succour from outside: a bombshell with a large enough "payload" at the UN to significantly boost his standing among the Palestinians.

If, that is, the spiraling tensions haven't rendered his planned "bombshell" irrelevant by the time the UN convenes. ■

Gerald Steinberg

For many years, Europeans and North Americans have largely been insulated from international turmoil. Although targeted by a few horrendous terror attacks and buffeted by oil shocks, the numerous wars and outbreaks of violence in parts of Asia, Africa and the Middle East generally did not reach the West.

As a result, many came to believe that they were the leading edge of a historic and universal revolution, in which the remaining pockets of war would be isolated and then eliminated. In universities, students were taught that violence between nations, including terrorism, could be cured, like a disease, by overcoming economic, social and psychological "root causes." Belief in international law and negotiations, regardless of the situation, replaced the practice of meeting force with force, while defence and deterrence were said to be passé and unacceptable. Well-intentioned westerners projected their own limited experience on the rest of the world, assuming that tolerance and empathy were universal.

In this spirit, western journalists who wrote about conflicts (particularly involving Israel) focused on human interest stories and victims, reinforcing the dominant mythology. The reality of warring nations and religions, motivated by incitement, hate and revenge, was ignored or self-censored. For example, after adopting the image of Palestinians as victims, thousands of terrorists and rocket attacks were reported only in passing.

As a result, when faced with the brutal war in Syria that triggered the massive outflow of refugees, western leaders have only been able to shake their collective heads and call for calm. Numerous peace conferences and lofty United Nations resolutions ended, predictably, without impact.

In Europe, where most of the refugees land after crossing the Mediterranean, the debate focuses on helping the victims. But the generous immigration policies, including the agreement of the United States and Canada to accept a few thousand refugees, are little more than Band-Aids. As long as the war between the Assad regime (aided by Hezbollah, Iran and Russia) and the Sunnis led by ISIS (with help from Qatar and Saudi Arabia) continues, there will be many more casualties and refugees.

However, the wishful thinking that erased war and deterrence from policy options available for western democracies remains a major problem. In other parts of the world, and the Middle East in particular, the inherent anarchy of international politics – what the 16th-century political philosopher Thomas Hobbes called "the state of nature" and the "war of all against all" – continues unabated. The calm that characterizes Europe and North America are exceptions, reflecting the devastation of two world wars and the horrors of the Holocaust.

In contrast, in the Middle East, Asia and other regions of the world, the best that can be achieved is a stability based on strong armies and mutual deterrence. The deadly anarchy in Syria, Iraq, Libya and other areas neighbouring Israel demonstrates that weak and isolated peoples and nations become inviting targets for destruction, as in the case of the Yazidis, Christians, and other minorities. Sunnis living near Shiite power centres, and Shiites caught in the path of ISIS, are equally vulnerable, and have joined the flood of refugees seeking to survive.

This has always been the reality that Israel has faced, and is the main obstacle to a serious and stable peace, as imagined by western diplomats, academics and other well-intentioned analysts. For most Israelis, who can watch the attacks and counterattacks between the various armed groups and terrorists along the Syrian and Lebanese borders, the importance of a strong defence is obvious. And while the military regime in Egypt is criticized for violating human rights, the priority of effective responses to terrorist groups that control large parts of the Sinai is also understandable. As the impact of these wars spread to the West, and the comfort zones based on myths of universal peace begin to crumble, perhaps the reality that Israel faces will be better understood. ■

Israel cracks down on Palestinian stone-throwers

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

The death of an Israeli man who lost control of his car after it was hit by a rock thrown in Jerusalem by rioting Palestinians earlier this month, has sparked new efforts to crack down on stone-throwers.

"Stones and firebombs are deadly weapons; they kill and have killed," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet last Sunday. "Therefore, in recent days we have changed the open-fire orders for police in Jerusalem. Already over the weekend they used the new measures under the new orders and immediately hit those throwing stones and firebombs. Today we will facilitate an additional expansion of the ability of the police to foil the throwing of stones and firebombs and we will continue to add forces in order to strike at rioters under a simple principle that we will begin to implement around and within its borders: Whoever tries to attack us, we will hurt him."

Netanyahu said he is also advancing legislation to impose fines on the parents of minors who throw stones and firebombs. He also wants the courts to impose minimum sentences for stone-throwing.

"We cannot accept the principle that in Jerusalem our capital, or in any part of the State of Israel, in the Galilee or in the Negev, that people will organize terrorism and begin to stone passing cars or throw stones and murder people," he said. "This norm will not be established here; rather an opposite norm will – we will act against you and stop you, and we will punish you with the full force of the law."

Tensions have been growing in Jerusalem over the past few weeks, and reached a peak over Rosh Hashanah, when police stormed the Temple Mount in Jerusalem's Old City after they said they had intelligence that young men were planning to barricade themselves inside. The police action sparked clashes between young Palestinians and police throughout Jerusalem.

"There are extra police units – both border police and undercover units – throughout the area to both prevent and respond to any stone throwing incidents," Jerusalem police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld told the Media Line. "Over Rosh Hashanah more than 150,000 people visited the Old City and we're expecting the same numbers in the next few weeks. We have manoeuvered a number of different units to make sure there's enough security in Jerusalem."

But some analysts say that Israel must take a broader approach to the tensions between Jews and Palestinians in Jerusalem. The population of Jerusalem is just over 800,000 and 36 per cent of them are Palestinians. According to the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, three-quarters of all Palestinians live below the poverty line.

"Increasing penalties for stone-throwing and more policing will only be partially effective," Kobi Michaeli, an expert on Palestinians at the Institute for National Security Studies (INSS) told the Media Line. "The whole approach should be integrative. This is a multi-dimensional challenge with a political, civilian and religious dimension."

He said that most of the incitement to violence is coming from Hamas, which controls Gaza, and the northern wing of the Islamic movement in Israel, both supported by Qatar. Israel should increase co-operation with Jordan which is in charge of the Waqf, the Muslim religious authority which supervises the Temple Mount.

Beyond that, he said, Israel must do more to improve the quality of life for Palestinians in East Jerusalem including improving the infrastructure in Palestinian neighbourhoods, building more classrooms, and improving the level of education in public schools there.

"We have to remember that there are 330,000 Palestinians in East Jerusalem and 99.9 per cent of them are not taking part in this violence," Michaeli said. "In fact they suffer from this violence. They don't want to be harassed by the Israeli police or to see roadblocks and barriers in their neighbourhoods. They want to improve their quality of life." ■

Britain's Labour leader and Jews need to mend fences

CNAAN LIPSHIZ AND JTA STAFF
JTA, LONDON

Jeremy Corbyn, the new head of Britain's opposition Labour Party, has many of the makings of a hero for British Jews.

A lawmaker with over 30 years experience, Corbyn passionately and eloquently defends blue-collar Britain, multiculturalism and a left-of-centre notion of social justice. These are issues that resonate with Britain's 250,000-strong Jewish community, which has historically leaned Labour.

Yet Corbyn's election earlier this month has generated unprecedented concern in British Jewry's ranks, where many resent his Israel-critical views and endorsement of anti-Semitic enemies of the Jewish state, including Islamist militant groups Hamas and Hezbollah.

Following an acrimonious exchange of allegations during Corbyn's campaign for Labour leader, he and representatives of British Jewry may now find they need to mend fences and figure out a way to work together.

"The problem is not that Corbyn is an anti-Semite or a Holocaust denier – he is neither," said Dave Rich, a spokesperson for the Community Security Trust, British Jewry's main watchdog. But Corbyn "seems to gravitate towards people who are, if they come with an anti-Israel sticker on them."

In fact, Corbyn recently said he has some Jewish ancestry. He told the Church Times that while his immediate family is Christian, he has a "Jewish element" in his background Britain's Jewish News reported.

In the interview with the Christian publication, he described himself as "not anti-religious at all," adding, "I go to churches, I go to mosques, I go to temples, I go to synagogues. I find religion very interesting. I find the power of faith very interesting."

Corbyn, 66, who has visited the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Israel nine times, publicly endorsed a blanket arms embargo on Israel and the boycott of Israeli universities involved in weapons research.

Jonathan Sacerdoti, a Jewish political commentator and journalist, said Corbyn's election "and failure to convincingly and definitively distance himself from his endorsements of anti-Semitic entities is sure to embolden the anti-Israel camp, and its anti-Semites."

Ambrosine Shitrit, co-founder of Yad B'yad, a right-leaning British anti-Semitism watchdog, called Corbyn's election "one of the most tragic things to have happened to Labour."

Corbyn's Jewish critics have said that if he is to be trusted, he must first clarify or backtrack from a string of gestures he made toward anti-Semitic individuals and groups.

Famous among those gestures was his use during a speech he made in 2009 of the term "friends" to describe activists from Hezbollah and Hamas.

"Tomorrow evening it will be my pleasure and my honour to host an event in parliament where our friends from Hezbollah will be speaking," Corbyn said of members of the Shiite Islamist militia and political party, whose leaders have made numerous anti-Semitic statements.

On Hamas – a Palestinian Islamic military and political group whose charter proclaims "a very great and very serious struggle against the Jews" – Corbyn said, "I've also invited friends from Hamas to come and speak as well. Unfortunately the Israelis would not allow them to travel here."

Labelling Hamas a terrorist group, Corbyn added, was "a big, big historical mistake."

In another widely cited incident, Holocaust denier Paul Eisen wrote that Corbyn donated money to his Palestinian advocacy group, Deir Yassin Remembered.

Corbyn denied the claim and said during a television interview in July that he did not agree with Hamas and Hezbollah. He called them friends only, he said, as a figure of speech. He defended his talks with militant Islamists by comparing them to right-wing Israelis, "who have the same view possibly that the State of Israel should extend from the river to the sea."

His explanations failed to convince supporters of Israel and Labour Jews, including lawmaker Ivan Lewis, who following Corbyn's election quit his position as shadow secretary of state for Northern Ireland.

Lewis challenged Corbyn to attend a meeting on anti-Semitism on the political left, and Corbyn accepted last week. The meeting, Lewis said, is meant in part to address "Corbyn's support in the past for people who have used anti-Semitic rhetoric."

Corbyn faces a chorus of other Labour critics, including former British prime minister Tony Blair, who say the Labour leader's radically socialist views on the economy will either split Labour, make it unelectable as a ruling party or both.

One of the most dramatic twists in Corbyn's strained relationship with British Jewry's establishment unfolded on Aug. 14, when the Jewish Chronicle – neither a right-wing publication nor one prone to making unfounded claims – warned in an editorial that Corbyn risked being "regarded from the day of his election as an enemy of Britain's Jewish community."

Speaking for what the paper said was "the vast majority of British Jews," the Chronicle's unusually harsh-worded editorial spoke of "deep foreboding at the prospect of Corbyn's election as Labour leader."

Yet British Jews also have an interest in working with Corbyn, as evidenced in a Sept. 12 statement by Simon Johnson, CEO of Britain's Jewish Leadership Council, an umbrella group with representation by the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Despite "a number of concerns regarding some of Mr. Corbyn's past connections," Johnson wrote, "We will, as we always have, find ways of working with Her Majesty's Opposition on matters relevant to us." He added, "We hope that the Labour movement remains a welcoming environment for members of the Jewish community, many of whom have lifelong commitments to it."

Johnson's statement reflects a mutual need by Corbyn and the British Jews for co-operation. This need will prevail – perhaps through a succession of low-key, trust-building encounters – over the current atmosphere of distrust, according to Keith Harris-Kahn, a London-area Jewish sociologist and editor of the Jewish Journal of Sociology.

"It's a very bad idea for the Jewish community to not have workable relationships with the major opposition party," Harris-Kahn said, citing the community's need to avoid partisanship and promote its interest in various British parliaments.

For Corbyn, Harris-Kahn said, "as a politician aspiring to be the prime minister of a multicultural country, it's a very bad idea for him to be alienated from the majority of one significant British minority." ■

Saudi Arabian ambassador remains head of UN human rights panel

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
NEW YORK

The Saudi Arabian ambassador to the United Nations was re-selected to chair an influential panel on the Human Rights Council, sparking the ire of human rights activists across the world, a UN watchdog group revealed Sept.20.

Faisal bin Hassan Trad was first appointed to head the five-member group of ambassadors – known as the Consultative Group – in June. The UN ambassadors of Greece, Algeria, Chile and Lithuania make up the rest of the panel, which is charged with selecting applicants from around the world to fill more than 75 positions "with mandates to report and advise on human rights from a thematic or country-specific perspective," according to a UN document.

UN Watch, an independent Geneva-based NGO, claims Trad's selection to chair the panel went intentionally unreported by UN diplomats.

Riyadh had initially campaigned to head the UN Human Rights Council altogether, but dropped that bid in June.

UN Watch executive director Hillel Neuer said in a statement that it was "scandalous that the UN chose a country that has beheaded more people this year than ISIS [the Islamic State] to be head of a key human rights panel. Petro-dollars and politics have trumped human rights.

"Saudi Arabia has arguably the worst record in the world when it comes to religious freedom and women's rights, and continues to imprison the innocent blogger Raif Badawi," Neuer added, in reference to the Saudi liberal activist who was sentenced to 10 years in prison and 1,000 lashes, despite international outrage over his case.

Badawi, a 31-year-old father, co-founded the Saudi Liberal Network Internet discussion group. He was arrested in June 2012 under cybercrime provisions, and a judge ordered the website to be closed after it criticized Saudi Arabia's notorious religious police.

The Saudi Supreme Court's decision to uphold Badawi's sentence in January is final and cannot be overturned without a royal pardon.

Saudi Arabia consistently ranks among "the worst of the worst" on Freedom House's annual survey of political and civil rights. ■

Jerusalem inspiration behind Koffler exhibit

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The first time artist and filmmaker Isabel Rocamora visited Jerusalem, she was spellbound by the prayers she heard as she walked through the Jewish, Muslim and Christian quarters of the city.

"There's this real sense of fervour, of prayer, of the connection with the beyond, with God. And then you open your eyes, there's a separation wall, there's flags, there's checkpoints and there's fear on all sides. I thought to myself, 'What a shame, what an irony,'" Rocamora said.

Her walk was the inspiration for Faith, a 22-minute installation film that looks for common ground among the three major religions in Jerusalem. Faith is premiering as part of Rocamora's first Canadian solo exhibition, Troubled Histories, Ecstatic Solitudes, at Toronto's Koffler Gallery until Nov. 29.

In the film, an Orthodox Jew, a Sunni Muslim and a Greek Orthodox Christian say their morning prayers in the Judean Desert, each one shown side by side on separate screens. The men pray, sometimes simultaneously, in settings that are connected to their religions. The Jew, Michael Cohen, prays in the Kumran Valley, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found; the Christian, Rev. Issa Taljieh, prays in the Wadi Qelt, where one of the ancient monasteries was built, and the Muslim, Feras Kazaz, the Qur'an reader at Jerusalem's Al Aqsa Mosque, worships at Nebi Musa, a Muslim holy site dedicated to Moses. Rev. Taljieh, a Palestinian, prays in Arabic. "He's a bridge" between the Jew and the Muslim, Rocamora said.

She said the three men were happy with the principle of praying beside other religions. Rocamora chose settings without buildings, without "constructed history," she said, so that "we're able to feel the religious rituals more directly."

Commenting on the similarities and differences between the worshippers, she added that when you observe the men praying, you realize how similar some of their prayer is and how distinct some of it is. "The similarity invites the viewer to think of these men as brothers and as human beings," she said.

Rocamora said that Faith poses the question: what would be possible if dialogue between people in conflict in the Middle East took place on a spiritual level? "Of course, priorities would have to change," she reflected. "They would not have to be financial, economic or territorial. They would have to be approached from the angle of spirituality."

Rocamora, who comes from a Roman Catholic background, described herself as a believer who has "a strong spirituality" but isn't religious.

Along with Faith, Rocamora's exhibit at the Koffler includes Portrait in Time and Gesture, a single-screen film that examines the transformation of the self's core over the course of an individual's history; Horizon of Exile, a dual-screen film about female identity, and Body of War, a single-channel film that reflects on the transformation of man into soldier.

Body of War was exhibited at the Herzliya Museum of Contemporary Art in 2012 and originally brought the Edinburgh-based Rocamora to Jerusalem. For the 20-minute film, released in 2010, she interviewed soldiers and ex-soldiers who can be heard speaking in the work set on the Normandy beaches. "What interested me was the ways different wars engage the human being," she said.

Body of War includes footage of a fight, actually a sequence of moves from krav maga, a self-defence system developed for the Israeli military, between two soldiers. Then the action is slowed down and you're able to perceive "the humanity and care inside the gesture of violence," Rocamora said. At one point, one of the soldiers bites the other and "with slowing down, it becomes a kiss."

Rocamora installation films have been exhibited at museums and galleries around the world. "My works are between fiction and documentary," she said. Some of them, like Faith, are multi-channel. "Several screens," she reflected, "allow for an immersive feel as well as discussion." ■

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Psychological thriller set in totalitarian Czechoslovakia

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There is a great deal over which to marvel in Innocence: Or, Murder on Steep Street.

The narrative is riveting. The art of its telling is powerful. And the back story to its publication is itself worthy of recounting; a testament to the author's steely will to hallow memory and, in so doing, bring a semblance of balance to history's often skewed scales of justice.

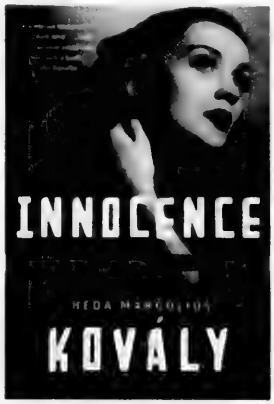
There is more than one murder in Innocence. A particularly gruesome one is the subject of the police investigation that provides the backdrop for the deft, slow, unravelling of the intricate layers of plot and character that hold the reader in thrall until the very last pages of the book. Late at night, a police officer is found stabbed to death in his car, which is parked on dark, gloomy Steep Street in Prague. His murder lies at the centre of a thick web of morally empty interconnections and interactions that choke and ensnare innocent lives.

The story unfolds in the early 1950s in totalitarian, Communist Czechoslovakia. State control is absolute. People live under suffocating conditions of constant, intrusive watchfulness. Personal happiness is defined by one of the key characters in the novel as merely "a good meal, an absence of suffering."

Imagine the works by Koestler or Solzhenitsyn about life in a police state. Imagine, too, the narrow, social and cultural strictures in the world depicted by Kafka. As skillfully as they, Kovaly depicts the desperate emptiness, the deep, crushing lack of purpose and pervasive fear of everyday life under totalitarian conditions.

The husband of one of the key characters, Helena, is arrested – taken without explanation, without warning, without charge, without reason. Helena's life then descends rapidly into an anguish of worry, alarm and life-sapping resignation. She describes her life's parameters.

"Reading was a dangerous thing for someone like me. It gave you something beyond your own sad, lonely life, and though it acted as a protective shield, it could not be used as a wall or screen, a thing to hide behind. You could sit at home alone by the stove experiencing all these sensational things: loving, fearing, fighting, even dying, all in the space of one afternoon and three cups of coffee. Slowly you forgot that the story came from somebody's head, and you began to expect the same pattern and rules in real life as in books. You deluded yourself into thinking that after every exposition came a climax and a resolution, every episode fit into every arc of the narrative and nothing happened without a purpose, since of course the story had to unfold smoothly and make some kind of sense. It was a dangerous drug."



Innocence: Or, Murder on Steep Street
By Heda Margolius Kovaly
Translated by Alex Zucker
(Soho Press Inc. 2015)

Helena is actually only a pawn being manipulated by "the system." Her life – her humanity, her existence, her worth as a human being – means nothing to the state authorities other than as a detail in a wider manipulation, a name in a dossier full of suspects' names, and ultimately, a trap by which to catch a larger prey.

Fear of betrayal constantly frames the behaviour of individuals. Colleagues at work might be informants. Friends might be unsuspecting targets of the Party decision-makers. In one particularly memorable scene, the author describes the mechanics and the impact of a seemingly innocuous betrayal.

"But then it hit me. A man had lost his life and I was responsible… I realized there's no such thing as a 'little' bad thing because nobody can predict what will come of it… it can grow into a big thing before you even know it…

"No one can do a thing to stop people like H… They're like earthquakes, or the plague. But they could never inflict so much misery if it weren't for little bastards like N… the little helpers who try to convince you it doesn't matter, there's nothing wrong with a little snitching… They make evil seem like a natural trivial thing… they blur the line between guilt and innocence, till eventually you accept it and murder just seems like an accident with nobody to blame."

Innocence is a psychological thriller. Since conversation with others is fraught with risk, only conversation with one's self is safe. Hence, Kovaly brings the readers into the private chambers of her characters' thoughts and pitiful, despairing lives. And she does so masterfully. She writes mournfully of the desolation of the characters' lives, but not in over-wrought prose. The language is sculpted by the harsh self-awareness of the extent to which other people control one's life.

Innocence is Kovaly's only novel, but it was not her only published work. Kovaly had earlier written Under a Cruel Star, an acclaimed memoir about her experiences in Auschwitz and then in the early years of Communist rule in Czechoslovakia.

Innocence is also partly autobiographical. It was written in Kovaly's native Czech language when she lived in London and Boston, and published in 1985 by a Czech-language German expatriate press. The book only appeared in the Czech Republic in 2013, after her death in 2010 at the age of 91.

In an elegiac introduction to the book, Kovaly's son encapsulates what lies ahead for the reader. "In the intensely complex psychological drama, the heroine, Helena Novakova, is an almost-autobiographical portrait of Heda during her most trying times… She depicts how she felt and thought, how the ordinary people around her behaved, how they tried to overcome the stranglehold of the Communist regime. Similar to the characters in Albert Camus' fictional universes, all of Heda's characters are guilty to various degrees, although they all declaim their innocence."

Kovaly's book is an important and rewarding read. ■

Tributes pour in for violinist Jacques Israelievitch

STEPHEN CERA
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The recent death of the eminent violinist Jacques Israelievitch, 67, marks the end of a life devoted to music and the arts. The French-born musician succumbed to cancer in Toronto on Sept. 5.

I first met Jacques and his wife, Gabrielle, soon after their arrival in Toronto in 1988. He came here to assume the position of concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), and would eventually become the longest-serving concertmaster in the history of the TSO, departing in 2008 after 20 years. He also served as the music director of the Koffler Chamber Orchestra at the Koffler Centre of the Arts from 2005 until its demise in 2014.

Israelievitch was a musician of high intelligence, vast experience, determination, enterprise, curiosity, and integrity. We became friends and colleagues, and I was honoured to perform as pianist with him in 2014 and earlier this year. He played the viola in our recitals – and of course, played it wonderfully.

Jacques was a tireless musician whose greatest joy was to rehearse and perform, whether as a solo violinist or violist, chamber musician or concerto soloist. His musical tastes were all-embracing, ranging from unaccompanied Bach through virtuoso romantic repertoire to demanding contemporary works. His appetite for music and art was unquenchable.

Visual art, especially ceramic art, was one of Jacques' passions. Upon his arrival in Canada, he tried to learn all he could about Canadian art. He and Gabrielle commissioned works from Canadian artists and employed Canadian craftspeople to build objects. They became charter members of Toronto's Gardiner Museum. Jacques undertook collaborations that combined music with the visual arts.

> Israelievitch was a musician of high intelligence, vast experience, determination, enterprise, curiosity and intelligence

He was deeply committed to teaching violin, viola and chamber music in Toronto, at the Chautauqua Institution in western New York, and at master classes in China and Japan, among other places.

Glowing testimonials to his teaching were posted on Facebook soon after his death.

From Nicole: "Thank you for inspiring in me the greatest thing that any teacher could teach: not to be a mere pedestrian – to be different, and to do things your own unique way. Whether it be in musical performance or involvement in the community, those words guided my every experience and brought me to where I am today. So I thank you for igniting that fire 10 years ago, in the 10-year-old mind of mine. Your legacy will live with us forever."

From Jamie Kruspe, assistant concertmaster of Canadian Opera Company Orchestra: "RIP Mr. Israelievitch, you will be missed by all. It was an honour and a privilege to have been your student and work with you over the years. Thank you so much for having such a strong musical influence on me.

"I'll never forget what you taught me and how you inspired me during my studies at U of T and Chautauqua, but most of all I will miss making music with you in the Koffler Orchestra. It is going to be hard for me to accept that you're no longer here with us. I'll see to it that your unique and sincere style of playing lives on."

From Samantha: "Your teachings and love for the art will always be reflected in my playing. To the best violin mentor anyone can ever ask for, Mr. Israelievitch."

Other tributes came in from those he touched.

From the TSO: "With deep sadness we mourn the passing of our dear friend and former longtime concertmaster Jacques Israelievitch... he made immeasurable contributions to the orchestra during his tenure. Our deepest condolences to his family from all of us at the TSO."

From the Chicago Symphony Orchestra: "The Chicago Symphony Orchestra notes with sorrow the passing of violinist Jacques Israelievitch, who served the orchestra as assistant concertmaster from 1972 until 1978."

From Peter Herrndorf, president and CEO of the National Arts Centre: "Jacques Israelievitch performed many times with the TSO at the National Arts Centre, especially after our orchestras began to perform annually in each other's concert halls starting in 2004 as part of our special relationship. Our sympathies go out to his family and all his colleagues in the music community.

"The life of Jacques Israelievitch exemplified commitment and high professionalism, and will continue to inspire all those whose lives he enriched." ■

Art show funds research on sleep disorders in youth

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

Is there a connection between children's sleep problems and attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder (ADHD)?

It's an issue Dr. Colin Shapiro, a psychiatrist specializing in sleep disorders, will address in a research project he plans to run in conjunction with the Youthdale Child and Adolescent Sleep Centre research program.

He said it is possible that many children who are being diagnosed with ADHD "may have a simple and very treatable sleep disorder."

Funding for this research project will come in part from an art exhibition featuring the works of 21 artists. The week-long show will be held at Metro Hall Rotunda starting on Oct. 1

The show is the seventh exhibition Shapiro has held with Youthdale Treatment Centres in support of research in child and adolescent sleep disorders. Youthdale, a children's mental health centre, offers residential, emergency and out-patient services to youth between the ages of 12 and 18.

Blue Lady by Stephen Selesnick

Shapiro said that through word of mouth, various international artists from the United States, France, Peru and Israel, along with Canadian participants have been involved in the show.

Into the Light by Deena Sherman

"In the exhibition this year we have a number of artists from far-flung places who have not exhibited before. These include the Sunshine Coast in British Columbia, Chicago and Boston."

About half the artists happen to be Jewish, he said. In fact, three of the exhibitors – Naomi Pollak, Stephen Selesnick, and Dr. Ashley Davidoff, are Shapiro's former schoolmates from King David High School in Johannesburg.

The South African-born physician said there was little information about sleep disorders when he began medical school in the early '70s.

As a medical student, Shapiro had the opportunity to do research in sleep for a month at Stanford University. He later completed a PhD at the University of Edinburgh.

In 1990, he was recruited by the psychiatry department of the University of Toronto. He started a neuropsychiatry department at Toronto Western Hospital, where he continues to practise today.

In his work with Youthdale, Shapiro dealt with sleep disorders.

Maccabi Tel Aviv soccer team proud to represent Israel

DANIEL KOREN

It's a glorious time to be a football fan in Israel.

In its European Cup qualifying match earlier this month, the Israeli national soccer team was able to pull off a draw against Wales, arguably a more formidable team, allowing the blue-and-whites to stave off elimination and maintain their bid to enter the 2016 tournament.

On a different but equally important field, the premier soccer club in Israeli football, Maccabi Tel Aviv FC, was relentless in its quest to make the Champions League for the first time in 11 years – a goal that was fulfilled following its 1-1 draw against FC Basel of Switzerland on Aug. 25.

The club's appearance in the Champions League club competition is its second time competing in the tournament in its storied history.

With the first round of the playoffs officially underway, Maccabi faced off against Chelsea on Sept. 16, losing 4-0. With several games still ahead, it is worth noting that the Israelis have ample chance to make up for the loss and prepare for their next battle against Chelsea, which has had its worst start to a domestic top-flight season in 29 years.

It's also worth mentioning that Slaviša Jokanović, Maccabi's relatively new head coach, once sported Chelsea's royal blue jersey himself.

"I have been here for only two to three months, so I am particularly happy with our performances in Europe and at the start of the season," Jokanović said in an interview. "I feel proud with what my team has done and the way in which they performed so far, but one doesn't sum things up after such a short period of time, as an entire season is ahead of us. I believe we can be a better team and there is a lot of room for improvement."

Despite whatever obstacles lie ahead, not to mention being placed in Group G along with three teams who have a better ranking, Jokanović is grateful for the "great opportunity" to compete against Europe's top teams like Chelsea, Porto and Dynamo Kyiv, who have all won European titles in the past. On his playing against his former Chelsea teammates in Stamford Bridge, he admits there are "no cards up a sleeve" when you are a football coach.

"I am happy because I can wear the Maccabi colours with pride and represent Israel in Europe. My job is to try and make as successful a job as possible with Maccabi against Chelsea."

Tal Ben-Haim, an iconic member of Israeli football for over 13 years, says he's thrilled to have played his first Champions League match with Maccabi, particularly since he left Tel Aviv for Bolton Wanderers FC back in 2004 when Maccabi first qualified for the Champions League.

"This is coming full circle for me," Ben-Haim told The CJN. "I must admit that at first I felt this twitch, especially as they [Maccabi Tel Aviv] were drawn against Bayern Munich, Juventus and Ajax in '04. After I had signed for Maccabi this summer, it was almost clear to me, and I can't explain why, that we would qualify for the Champions League. I guess I had a lot of faith and recognition in the quality of this squad and strength of this club."

Despite the team's "shaky start" with their defeat to Chelsea, Ben-Haim said Maccabi has proven it has a right to be where it is because of its hard work, professionalism and character.

"This is nothing short of amazing," he exclaimed. "This is a great achievement for the club, the players, the staff, the fans and everyone involved with Maccabi Tel Aviv and Israeli football."

While nobody on the team is sugarcoating it – Maccabi Tel Aviv is the true underdog of this tournament – no one is saying they can't succeed either. After all, who doesn't love a good underdog story?

"In football, almost everything is achievable, but one has to remain realistic as well," Ben-Haim said. "This is an extremely difficult task, especially if you take into account the calibre of teams we are facing in our group. But at Maccabi, we never look that far ahead, we always focus on the upcoming match."

According to Jokanović, perhaps even more important than winning is playing the game gracefully, with respect and aplomb.

"We must respect all our opponents, but more importantly, respect ourselves as a club, which obviously includes our fans. We must give everything we have on the pitch, remain focused on the task at hand and be brave with our approach to the games."

Maccabi Tel Aviv: A Cinderella Story – which is what the documentary will be called if the Israelis are able to persevere through the first round – continues with the team's next match against Dynamo Kyiv on Sept. 29. ■

Artists donate 50 per cent of sales to sleep research

He said a patient in his adult clinic suggested he hold an art exhibit to raise awareness about children's sleep problems. "We now have this annual art exhibition."

The artists who participate donate 50 per cent from the sale of their pieces to the Youthdale sleep research program, Shapiro said, noting that buyers get a tax receipt for 50 per cent of the purchase.

Many artists were interested in participating in the show when they heard that the funds raised would be directed to mental health issues affecting children and adolescents, Shapiro said. "Some people re-exhibit. It's been an organic process."

Sleep and Dreams* by Ashley Davidoff

The proceeds from an earlier show have helped fund a study on sleeplessness and driving, which is still in process. Shapiro said they are researching the impact of sleepiness on the driving patterns of young and older adolescents.

The question to be answered is whether or not sleep deprivation causes younger adolescent drivers, ages 16 to 17, to have more accidents than drivers who are 22 to 25, he said.

Another study conducted in 2012 focused on sleep problems among children with fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS). Shapiro pointed out that these youngsters – brain damaged in the womb by alcohol consumption during pregnancy – have the second highest rate of sleep problems among children and adolescents.

Shapiro said the study indicated that the majority of these children have abnormal secretion levels of melatonin, a brain hormone that induces sleep and this research has improved clinical results. "Our success rate in treatment has already gone from 10 to 80 per cent." ■

The exhibit runs from Oct. 1 to Oct. 7 at the Metro Hall Rotunda, 55 John St. The opening is Oct. 1 from 6 to 8 p.m., but the art works can be viewed weekdays from 7:30 a.m. to 9:30 p.m. and 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. on weekends.

WRY BREAD

The candidate we deserve

David Levine

My name is Stewart Lieber, and it gives me great pleasure to announce my candidacy for the office of prime minister of Canada. This is not an office I had intended to seek, but recent developments have convinced me that I have an important role to play.

I won't bore you with my background or domestic policy. As a candidate, the only things you need to know about me are my allegiance to Israel and the number of relatives I lost in the Holocaust – which, my research confirms, exceeds all other candidates.

I'm encouraged by a recent (and deeply scientific) B'nai Brith survey of Canadian Jews, which revealed that in this coming Canadian election, Israel-related issues are most important to 65 per cent of you. What a relief to see others recognize that terror is much more likely to strike than economic turmoil, and that the boycott, divestment and sanctions "movement" should be of greater concern than poverty and affordable housing – and far more important than the environment, which failed to make the list! I knew at once that I had to declare my candidacy.

You see, I'm no career politician. I'm just like you.

Like you, I love the State of Israel with all my heart and soul. I have visited four times, and maintain several close Facebook friendships with Israelis.

Like you, I fear for her existence so viscerally that my life is a lonely tale of dread and anxiety. I scan the Internet constantly for news of an unprovoked nuclear catastrophe. I'll randomly dial an Israeli phone number once an hour, every hour, just to be sure things are OK.

And, like you, I believe that I am personally responsible for Israel's welfare, and for every misfortune that befalls her.

Most importantly, we all know that when it comes to Israel, the worst is always just about to happen.

Our great country was founded on the values of community, charity and morality. It brings me no end of grief to watch our current leading candidates betray these values and undermine the things we love most about Canada.

My platform, however, is rooted in our shared values, the same values that inspired me to run.

I am, first and foremost, a staunch supporter of our true country, the great State of Israel, no matter the issue or context. While we can all agree that most of my fellow candidates deserve to be tried for war crimes over their spineless capitulation to the forces of boycott-fuelled jihad, I say that even Prime Minister Stephen Harper's rhetoric fails to match his actions. Has he ever risked the fundamental well-being of his country for the State of Israel? What are his true priorities?

If elected, I pledge to address Canada's ongoing support of Israel through tangible and immediate action: I will divert all federal tax revenue to Israel and reassign all military personnel there. Several of our "national luxury assets" will be nationalized and liquidated, so that the proceeds can help our brothers and sisters in their time of despair, including: the maple syrup industry, all sports franchises, museums and national parks, coastal fishing rights and Ryan Gosling.

As a show of solidarity, the Maple Leaf at the centre of our flag will be replaced with a red Star of David.

These are temporary measures, of course, designed only for sustainability until the day that war no longer threatens to erupt in the Middle East.

It has been only days since I first declared my candidacy, and already my campaign has been beset on all sides by a predictable phalanx of cynics and haters, each more anti-Semitic than the last. I've been laughed at, taunted and slapped in the face. I've been told repeatedly that my campaign is too different, too Jewish, too far outside the rules of Canada's electoral system – but I refuse to be placated, or made to understand. I will make my vision a reality, with your help.

Please join me. Together we can make Canada make Israel a better place. ■

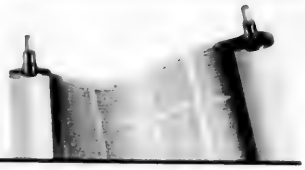
Ha'azinu | Deuteronomy 32:1-32:52



Rabbi Aaron Katchen says Sukkot forces us to confront just how little control we have in life
Rabbi Michal Shekel looks forward to a refreshing and nourishing beginning to the new year
Rabbi Howard Morrison explains the message of hachnasat orchim embodied by the sukkah

Aaron Katchen

For a seven day period you shall live in booths (sukkot). Every resident among the Israelites shall live in booths, in order that your [ensuing] generations should know that I had the children of Israel live in booths when I took them out of the land of Egypt. I am the Lord, your God (Leviticus 23:42-43).

I grew up in Calgary, and my memories of Sukkot involved snow and sitting in the sukkah in a ski jacket. When I lived in England, it was sitting in the rain. And here in Toronto, we seem to always have wasps join us in the sukkah. Why do I keep sitting in my sukkah (besides the basic answer, that God told me to)?

The rabbis of the Talmud dispute how to understand the booths from the verses above. Rabbi Akiva states that the verse is meant literally, and refers to actual booths. Rabbi Eliezer explains that the sukkot refer to the Clouds of Glory (Ananei HaKavod), which represent God's divine protection in the wilderness.

For me, this metaphor is apt and necessary. My religious identity informs me of my free choice and agency in life, which is good. But Sukkot comes around and I move out of my house and into my wooden booth (with snow, rain and wasps), and I am forced to confront how little control I really have in life. When I can achieve the understanding of the things I really do not control, and become whole with them, this is where the gift of Sukkot really lies.

Sukkot has another commandment: "And you will be only happy – ach sameach" (Deuteronomy, 16:15). By recreating the tenuous existence of being in God's protection, and thus being truly aware of what I do and do not have control over, this is where real happiness can be achieved and known.

Chag Samayach – have a happy Sukkot. ■

Michal Shekel

May my discourse come down as the rain,
My speech distil as the dew,
Like showers on young growth,
Like droplets on the grass. (Deuteronomy 32:2).

These words are part of Moses' last poem, which praises God and chastises us.

Water is often taken to symbolize Torah. Both rain and dew are necessary to nourish plants. Depending on the time of year, we pray for one or the other. If Torah is water, then we are the plants nourished by this holy water in its many forms.

Biblical poetry doesn't rhyme. It employs a technique called parallelism, applying synonymous words in different parts of the verse. This is evident in the verse above by the use of the synonymous parallels discourse and speech, rain and dew, showers and droplets, young growth and grass.

However, similarity is not exactitude, and the differences in word choice have been parsed by commentators. Sforno sees the abundant showers providing some droplets to each of us. Abravanel views the rain as Torah available to all, while precious droplets are the insights that reach only a select few. Rashi, always practical, points out that vital rainwater can be inconvenient, for example, if you're on a journey.

Water can be perilous. Tfilat Geshem, the prayer for rain recited on Shmini Atzeret, concludes: "For blessing, not curse, for life, not death, for abundance, not scarcity."

If Torah is like rain, can it be equally troublesome? In Ha'azinu, Moses makes us take a long hard look at ourselves. Forced to face what we would rather ignore, our nature revealed by this biblical poem can be disturbing.

We are still in the season of repentance. Ha'azinu is a splash of cold water on the face: it may be jarring, but it is also a refreshing start to the new year. ■

Several mitzvot surround the festival of Sukkot, including taking the four species and dwelling in the sukkah. Beyond the requirements of the holiday are some beautiful customs as well. One is ushpizin, inviting exalted guests into the sukkah. Based on Kabbalah, the Jewish mystical tradition, the seven exalted guests are Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and David. Biblical texts describe these heroic figures as shepherds of our people. On each of Sukkot's seven nights of Sukkot, one in particular is acknowledged.

Throughout the year, the Jewish home is an open one, modelled after the first Jewish couple, Abraham and Sarah, who were known to sit by the entrance of their tent to welcome those in need. To this day, especially on Shabbat and festivals, we welcome the needy, relatives, and old and new friends into our homes. On Sukkot, however, there's an added dimension. Time and space, past and present, become intertwined in the Sukkah. People we know in the present enter the Sukkah and interact with the values embodied by heroes of our past. A conversation that spans the ages takes place. Thus, the Sukkah is the ultimate place where the practice of hachnasat orchim, the welcoming of guests, takes place.

While most prayer books and works of art depict the ushpizin as the seven male biblical figures mentioned above, different kabbalistic traditions also enumerate seven female biblical figures to be invited as well. The lists of heroic women vary depending on the source. In some contemporary practices, the male figures are teamed with appropriate female figures. One suggestion extends the invitation to Sarah, Rebecca, Leah, Rachel, Miriam, Deborah, and Ruth.

In preparation for Sukkot, I encourage everyone to fulfil the mitzvot of taking the four species and dwelling in the Sukkah. If you've never observed the custom of ushpizin, consider it as well. Learn some of the attributes associated with our biblical heroes. Speak about them in the Sukkah and integrate the values of the past with the realities of the present. ■

Simchat Torah ideas as the holidays come to a close

FRANCINE KURLANDSKI
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Simchat Torah marks the end of a month of celebration and introspection, where family and friends get together both in the shul and in the home. Traditionally, the foods we eat at this time of year are ones that have stuffing, to represent a year of fullness, and my mother, like so many other mothers made stuffed cabbage, but here are some new twists on the stuffing motif that I hope that you and your family will enjoy.

Stuffed peppers with ground beef and rice

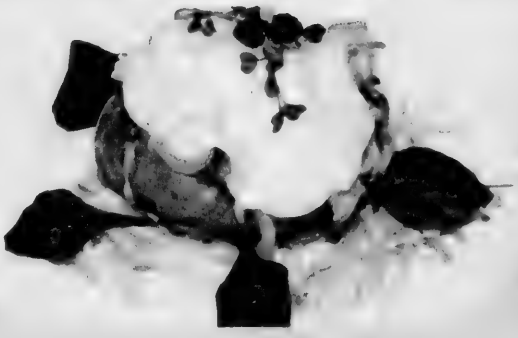
- ❑ 1 1/2 lb. lean ground beef
- ❑ 6-7 bell peppers, green or red, or your choice
- ❑ 1 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1 tbsp. pareve margarine
- ❑ 1/2 cup onion, chopped
- ❑ 1/2 cup celery, chopped
- ❑ 1 can diced tomatoes
- ❑ 1 cup tomato sauce
- ❑ 1 garlic clove, crushed
- ❑ 1 tsp. dried oregano
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. dried basil
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt, divided
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. pepper, divided
- ❑ 2 tbsp. sugar
- ❑ 1 egg lightly beaten
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. pareve Worcestershire sauce (optional)
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups cooked rice

Preheat oven to 350.

Cut tops off peppers. Remove seeds and membranes. Place peppers in a large pot and cover with water. Bring to a boil and simmer for 5 minutes. Drain and set aside.

In a large skillet, heat oil and margarine over medium heat. Sauté onion and celery until tender. Add tomatoes, tomato sauce, garlic, oregano, basil, 1/2 tsp. salt, 1/4 tsp. pepper and sugar. Simmer for 10-15 minutes.

In a large bowl, combine egg, 1/2 tsp. salt, 1/4 tsp. pepper and Worcestershire sauce. Add raw ground beef, cooked rice and 1 cup of the tomato mixture. Stuff peppers with meat mixture and put into an ovenproof baking dish. Pour remaining sauce over peppers. Bake for 65 minutes.



Salmon stuffed baked potatoes

- ❑ 4 large baked potatoes
- ❑ 1 can salmon, drained and deboned
- ❑ 1/4 cup mayonnaise
- ❑ 1/4 cup cottage cheese
- ❑ 3/4 cup grated cheddar cheese
- ❑ Salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 1/2 cup grated cheddar cheese.
- ❑ paprika to taste.

Preheat oven to 400. In a bowl, combine salmon, mayonnaise, cottage cheese, 3/4 cup cheddar cheese, salt and pepper. Mix well.

Scoop out the inside of baked potatoes and fill with salmon mixture.

Top with 1/2 cup grated cheddar cheese and sprinkle with paprika. Bake for approximately 10 minutes. Makes 4 servings.

Braised chicken with artichokes and olives

- ❑ 8 boneless, skinless, trimmed chicken thighs about 1 1/2 pounds
- ❑ sea salt
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ 3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1 yellow onion, diced
- ❑ 3 garlic cloves, thinly sliced
- ❑ 1 tsp. turmeric
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. ground cumin
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. ground coriander
- ❑ generous pinch red pepper flakes
- ❑ 1 cinnamon stick or 1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
- ❑ 1 bay leaf
- ❑ 2 cups chicken broth
- ❑ 2 tsp. grated lemon zest
- ❑ 3 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
- ❑ 1 cup canned chickpeas, rinsed and mixed with a spritz of lemon juice, and a pinch of salt
- ❑ 8 thawed frozen or jarred artichoke hearts, rinsed
- ❑ 1/2 cup pitted green olives, such as picholine or manzanilla
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped fresh mint

Pat the chicken dry and season with salt and pepper. Heat the olive oil in a Dutch oven or heavy soup pot over medium-high heat.

Add the chicken, working in batches if necessary, and cook until well browned on each side, approximately 3 minutes per side. Transfer to a plate. Decrease the heat to medium.

Add the onion and a pinch of salt, and sauté until soft and slightly golden, approximately 5 minutes. Add the garlic and sauté for 1 minute. Add the turmeric, cumin, coriander, red pepper flakes, cinnamon and bay leaf. Cook, stirring constantly, until fragrant, about 1 minute.

Pour in 1/4 cup of the broth to deglaze the pot, stirring to loosen any bits stuck to the bottom. Stir in a pinch of salt and cook until the liquid is reduced by half. Stir in the remaining broth, lemon zest and 2 tbsp. of the lemon juice.

Decrease the heat to medium-low, cover, and simmer for 15 minutes. Add the chicken, chickpeas, artichoke hearts, and olives. Stir gently to combine.

Increase the heat to medium-high and simmer uncovered, stirring occasionally until the chicken is heated through, about 5 minutes. Stir in the remaining tbsp. of lemon juice. Add lemon juice and salt to taste. Garnish with mint. Serves 4. ■

Elizabeth May: Jews have been the heart, soul and conscience of Canada for a long time

ygoldstein@thecjn.ca

Elizabeth May is currently in the midst of her third federal election campaign as leader of the Green Party of Canada, a post she has held for nine years. The member of parliament for the riding of Saanich-Gulf Islands, B.C., spoke recently to The CJN about the upcoming election, Israel, accusations of anti-Semitism in her own party and the Syrian refugee crisis.

How is the campaign going?

I think it's going remarkably well for Greens, considering we have a certain amount of struggle to claim space and be heard.

We're gaining momentum for the first time ever for us in an election campaign. Usually when you go into an election campaign, people in public opinion polls will say, "I'll vote Green," but when it comes to the ballot box, they say, "Oh, maybe not." So, this is the first time that our public support levels across Canada, and particularly in British Columbia, are growing during the writ period. So, that's pretty encouraging.

Parts of our policy inspire people who used to vote Conservative – things like the fact that we're the most transparent party, and the most accountable. And we're respectful in Parliament – we never heckle. So, some of the more traditional Conservative voters are deciding that they want to vote Green.

At the same time, some traditional NDP voters are thinking they don't like the way their party is moving toward the centre. So for the other issues – for instance, trade agreements – we have former NDPers moving to the Green party.

And the biggest voting block that we are really going after are people who simply haven't voted ever, or for years. And that's, of course, the largest voting block in Canada in the last number of elections, the 40 per cent of people who don't vote.

What do you think Canada should be doing regarding the Syrian refugee crisis?

It's a disaster at many levels.

If you're looking for the single-largest instigating factor, you'd be talking about the brutal dictatorship of [Syrian President] Bashar Assad.

We abhor the existence of Islamic State (ISIS) , but in the context of Syria, ISIS is just one of a number of what we would normally consider terrorists and horrible

Elizabeth May, leader of the Green party

> We really have to find a way to explain to people that it doesn't help the security of Israel to have Canada only support the most right-wing party in Israel organizations, like Al Qaeda and Al Nusra, allied against Assad. I don't there's a single group that I've mentioned that any Canadian would think could form a government in a way that respected human rights. We don't want to be aligned with Assad and Hezbollah any more than we want to be aligned with Al Qaeda, ISIS and Al Nusra. It's a terrible set of choices.

And in the midst of all this, there are the suffering innocents of Syria.

Right now, we need to mobilize. We should have been doing it years ago, but I think Canadians are demanding that there be a more urgent and robust response to the humanitarian crisis in Syria.

Where does the Green party stand on Israel?

We stand very firmly in support of the right of the State of Israel to exist and defend itself. We do think that there is a question of proportionality, so we have been critical from time to time of the decisions that [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu has made, but we are very mindful of campaigns that can verge into anti-Semitism.

We are very concerned about Palestinian rights and Palestinian justice, but we are also very concerned about any rise in anti-Semitism either in the region or in Canada.

I think that's the responsible position to take, and I think we are where most Canadians are.

Where do you stand on the boycott divestment and sanctions movement specifically?

We don't support it.

What do you say to Jewish voters who want to support a cleaner environment and some of your other positions, but are concerned that if they don't support other parties that they might be endangering Israel. Is there a way that voters can have both?

We really have to find a way to explain to people that it doesn't help the security of Israel to have Canada only support the most right-wing party in Israel. Israel – as a state, as a country, as a society, as a democracy – needs to be defended and supported by Canada, but Canada loses our influence in the world – we reduce the credibility of our statements – when we appear to be aligned with only one party.

We believe that the strongest way to defend the right of the State of Israel is to achieve a durable peace in the region. And that will occasionally mean that we don't agree with everything a particular political party in Israel does.

Take us back to the controversy last year after former Green party president Paul Estrin published a pro-Israel blog on the party's website and the backlash that ensued, which eventually led to Mr. Estrin leaving the party. How did the Green party handle the situation? Is there anything you wish you would have done differently?

Mr. Estrin didn't put the blog under his own name. That was the problem. He signed his piece as the president of the Green Party of Canada.

Paul is a very great guy, and I wish that I hadn't been in a remote location with no access to a phone when all this started to blow up.

The party executive talked to him, and he decided to resign. I reached out to him immediately and said, "Paul, let's keep you involved in the party – it would be great if you would stay on the executive in a different position other than president – or how about running, being a candidate in the election for the Green party?"

If I have any regrets, it's that I wasn't in a position to call Paul earlier. I sure regretted losing him.

Life is long, he's a young guy and he'll probably come back and work with us again. I sure hope so.

In the wake of that situation, it did seem to awaken people to the fact that there are some in your party who hold strongly anti-Israel views. Does that concern you?

I'm not aware of people in the party who hold anti-Israel views. But, of course, there are about 20,000 members and I don't know all of them. But certainly within the party leadership, within party policy, our debates are really respectful. The position that we came up with during the Gaza conflict called for more neutrality on the part of Canada and to work as hard as possible for a ceasefire and for peaceful solutions to the conflict. That entire debate happened in a spirit of respect and neutrality. And certainly, no one expressed any anti-Israel positions. That would have violated what we consider Green values.

Do you think Israel is being turned into a wedge issue of sorts in this election?

No, I don't think so. I think what's happened is, strangely enough, that the other three major parties seem to feel that even the most muted criticism of Mr. Netanyahu's actions is off limits.

I don't think a chill on the discussion is healthy in Canadian democracy, it would certainly be unacceptable were a discussion about the Middle East to give any aid, comfort or space to views that were anti-Israel in the sense of being against the right of the State of Israel to exist.

You have the ear of the Canadian Jewish voters. What's your pitch?

You have been the heart and soul and conscience of Canada on many issues for a very long time. This is not the time to wed yourself to one hardline position of a party that has done so much to make Canada a less compassionate place. And I would urge you to look at the Green party's policies and platform and see if you don't see yourself there.

If you don't, let me know, I certainly would apologize if we are not meeting the aspirations of Canadians who have done so much for this country. ■

The life and times of a violin virtuoso

Backstory

FRANKLIN BIALYSTOK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The world of classical music, and humanity in general, lost a brilliant, kind and warm man, Jacques Israelievitch, who succumbed to cancer in Toronto on Sept. 5.

The tributes that have flowed into the media have rightly focused on his remarkable life as a violin virtuoso, but two other noteworthy perspectives on Jacques's life must be added – his role as the child of Jewish survivors of World War II and his devotion to his friends and family.

Israelievitch was born in 1948 in Cannes to Isidore and Simone, the eldest of five. Isidore was a prisoner of war, while Simone survived in hiding. Jacques was an infant when the family moved to Paris, and then to Le Mans, where his parents opened a womenswear shop. Initially successful, local anti-Semites instigated a boycott, placing the family in dire straits. At school, Jacques was in fights, and called sale juif.

Isidore and Simone instilled a love of music, and at an early age Jacques and his brothers Raymond and Edmond, took up the violin. Jacques was a prodigy, but the family could not afford to support his talent. Through a chance encounter between his teacher and her friend, his plight was conveyed to Germaine de Rothschild, wife of Eduard, who lived in a nearby chateau. Impressed with the child's brilliance, she paid for his instrument, case, records and a phonograph. When the family situation reached its nadir, Jacques was taken in to the children's home established by Mme. Rothschild. He soon left for Paris, and the rest is history.

When I asked Israelievitch why he chose to be a member of an orchestra instead of a soloist, he said: "In an orchestra, I have the opportunity to play all sorts of music, not just the violin repertoire. Further, I'm part of a collective effort where I develop professional and personal relationships that last for years. Finally, as a soloist, I'd be on the road, away from my family. I couldn't do that."

> When I last saw him, he was bright and lucid, listening to Shostakovich

Israelievitch, his wife, Gabrielle, and their sons, David, Michael and Joshua, were a tight knit unit. The family home was abuzz with lively discussions, friends dropping in, salon gatherings where Israelievitch and compatriots from the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) played, students arriving to study with their master. In 2008, when he turned 60, Jacques left the TSO, and after a 12-hour retirement became a professor of strings at York University in Toronto.

Jacques was devoted to playing modern as well as traditional classical music, in some cases commissioning new works. Among those composers that he promoted were the Canadian Jewish luminaries R. Murray Schafer, Murray Adaskin and Srul Irving Glick. He also played alternative music, in particular with his son Michael, a percussionist, that can be heard on their recording Hammer and Bow. He was also the founder and music director of the Koffler Chamber Orchestra from 2004 to 2014, artist in residence at Temple Sinai and at the Miles Nadal JCC, and played Kol Nidre at High Holiday services.

In February, he was diagnosed with inoperable cancer. Determined to go out on his terms, he chose to reject chemotherapy, as it would not allow him to play and teach. Despite an operation to rebuild his pelvic bone, he continued teaching and performing. In July, he launched an album of modern Canadian music and finished recording the Mozart sonatas, to be released next year.

During his final phase of life, Israelievitch was surrounded by family. When I last saw him, he was bright and lucid, listening to Shostakovich on his laptop.

"This is best summer of my life," he said. ■

Blue Jay plays on Yom Kippur, and a TV station uses a Nazi symbol

God didn't seem to hold it against him

Fifty years after Los Angeles Dodgers left-hander Sandy Koufax famously missed a World Series start on the Day of Atonement, Kevin Pillar, the Toronto Blue Jays' Jewish centre-fielder, played on both Erev Yom Kippur and the evening of the day itself in crucial games against the rival New York Yankees, who trailed the Jays for the AL East lead by 3-1/2 games going into the holiday. Pillar went three-for-three with a run, a home run and an RBI in a 6-4 loss in the first game, then drove in the winning run (after Yom Kippur had officially ended) in the second game, with a single in the bottom of the sixth inning.

Hey Jude, don't eat that food?

A Chicago TV station apologized for using a graphic of a yellow badge the Nazis forced Jews to wear during the Shoah to illustrate its report on the start of Yom Kippur. WGN aired the report the night of Sept. 22, hours after the holiday began. The badge – shaped like the Star of David and featuring the word "Jude," German for "Jew" – appeared atop concentration camp-uniform stripes and above the caption "Yom Kippur." Viewers quickly responded on social media. The station sought atonement for the graphic on Yom Kippur itself. "We are extremely embarrassed, and we deeply apologize to our viewers and to the Jewish community for this mistake," WGN said on its website.

SodaStream offers to help Syrians

Israeli company SodaStream has offered to take in Syrian refugees and employ them in its new factory in the Negev. Last month, SodaStream and the mayor of Rahat, which is near the beverage maker's factory, said they can absorb up to 200 families. Some 30 per cent of the 1,100 workers at the factory live in Rahat, a Bedouin city led by Mayor Talal Al-Krenawi. "As the son of a Holocaust survivor, I refuse to stand by and observe this human tragedy unfold right across the border in Syria," said SodaStream CEO Daniel Birnbaum. The offer is subject to government approval. SodaStream closed its West Bank factory and moved to the Negev after criticism from anti-Israel groups. ■

Another view of Norway

As a Norwegian who is not Jewish, living in Montreal, and married to a Canadian Jewish woman, I am happy that Gil Troy found Norway beautiful and that he describes most Norwegians as "hearty and friendly." But, when he jumps to stating that "there was an undercurrent of anti-Semitism, not just anti-Israelism, which overshadowed our vacation," I wonder what he is basing his statement on ("European anti-Zionism is actually anti-Jewish," Aug. 27).

My wife and I travelled in Norway this summer. We did observe the beautiful countryside and the high cost of wine, but failed to register the "undercurrent of anti-Semitism" that Troy is reporting.

When I was growing up in Norway in the 1950s and '60s, there was near universal and strong support for the new State of Israel. However, during the '70s, Norwegians were increasingly exposed to other sides of the conflict in the Middle East. In line with the country's commitment to UN activities, no less than 20,000 Norwegian soldiers served in the UN's UNIFIL peacekeeping force in Lebanon from 1978 to 1998. It has been widely documented and reported that the soldiers left Norway with strong sympathy for Israel, but became much more sympathetic to Palestinians during their stay.

This period became the turning point in most Norwegians' attitudes to Israel and the Palestinians. Gradually, from being seen as a conflict between good and evil, it was being seen as a conflict between two groups of people that both have legitimate interests and concerns. To stamp this point of view as anti-Semitism is profoundly incorrect, but unfortunately not uncommon in Jewish circles.

Although Troy states that he would return to Norway, I am not quite sure why, given the "undercurrent of anti-Semitism" that he describes. I can only hope that most people will reject this unjustified labelling, and take a chance to find out for themselves by visiting Norway.

Services can be enjoyable

It is disheartening when a rabbi such as Avi Finegold tells us that the Yom Kippur services are boring ("High Holiday services are stressful," Sept. 10).

To someone who is at home in the synagogue and has taken the trouble to find out ahead of time what the prayers are about, the liturgy is dramatic and poetic. Any cultural event needs some preparation to be fully enjoyed, which is why the classics are taught in schools. Otherwise we might go to Stratford to see Shakespeare only to see someone go on the stage and announce: "We have cut out the long boring speeches that have hard words in them, and instead we are all going to sing 'Yabby-babby.'"

Rabbi Finegold might actually enjoy the particular boring bits he refers to (the Temple sacrifices) if he heard a trained cantor and choir perform one of the many dramatic musical settings that have thrilled generations of worshippers.

Changing attitudes aids Jews

I am sorry to hear that letter writer David Green ("Christians and Jews," Sept. 3) feels that the mass of Christians are subjecting him and his circle to anti-Semitism.

I was born in Toronto in the early 1950s and have witnessed a sea change in attitudes. I do not think that there has been a time with less Christian anti-Semitism, both systemic and indirect, than exists today. Growing up wearing a kippah in the Bathurst and Lawrence area was a totally different experience for me than it is today. Going by a Catholic school meant walking through a gauntlet of pennies, garbage and spitballs being hurled at me by the students. Entering a bowling alley after school with friends meant risking a beating by other kids. Going to a public school meant facing an administration hostile to Jews, being forced to take off your kippah and saying the Lord's Prayer.

Orthodox shuls were full of congregants rushing in to say Yizkor on yom tov and then rushing off to work, as there was no concept of reasonable accommodation.

When I finished law school, none of the Jewish students in my class found employment in major law firms, and not because they were not qualified. To see a kippah on Bay Street or in court in the 1970s was a rare event.

I have worked for the last 36 years dealing with lawyers and clients of all religions and backgrounds and have never encountered anti-Semitism in the workplace. I would suggest that the picture Green paints may have been the story in the past, but is not representative of Toronto in 2015.

We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. They helped us fulfil every sacred rite, from Shmira to Shiva. Our father was never left alone, and neither were we. Thank you Benjamin's for keeping the light alive.

Open to the sky on Sukkot

In the sukkah, we're reminded that we're not alone, that we can find protection, and that as fragile as life seems to be, it's what allows us to celebrate

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: There are many messages and much symbolism associated with the sukkah. I'm interested in focusing on the sukkah's roof, the schach.

We are told that the schach should be made of something that once grew from the ground, that there should be more shade than sunlight, and that one should be able to see the stars when looking up though the schach.

On the surface, this all sounds so romantic, so warm and fuzzy. Yet upon closer inspection, there is something deeply fragile and vulnerable about the sukkah's roof. Peering through so as to see the stars is another way of saying that the roof has holes in it, while the requirement for more shade than sun is akin to a building project that's never quite finished.

Rabbi Splansky: The stars we see through the schach are the same stars Abraham set his gaze upon when God promised him countless descendants. The way you describe the holes in the roof as an incomplete building project reminds me of the custom to leave a small section of our so-called permanent homes undone, too, in order to anticipate the rebuilding of Jerusalem in the messianic era.

The sukkah also works as a vehicle for time travel. Each year with our kids, we play "Ushpizin Time Machine." Over dinner in the sukkah we take turns travelling back in time to visit with characters from Jewish history, or someone from the Jewish future.

Rabbi Fishman: Sukkot is associated with simchah. In one of our previous exchanges, you pointed out that this word is best translated as "joy." I think that what allows for this season to be lived so fully is the fact that the schach is so fragile.

Our houses are built of bricks and mortar, and yet we never celebrate our houses. What we celebrate instead is the Jewish home. The home is the place where we learn to share our deepest blessings with others – as the famous book title about life in the shtetl reminds us, "Life is with people."

We don't celebrate our buildings of stone, but rather our buildings of connection and relationship. Ultimately, this delicate roof encourages us to celebrate the bonds we create by reaching out across the divide. Perhaps this is also why the schach must allow for transference.

Rabbi Splansky: One mitzvah of Sukkot is to "dwell in sukkot," another is to "rejoice."

But what if the schach leaks rain into your soup and invites cold wind or mosquitoes? What if you are miserable in the sukkah? The greater mitzvah is to rejoice, so we are permitted to go indoors for our festive meal. The mitzvah challenge, however, is to find a way to rejoice despite exposure to the elements, to feel the embrace of God's shelter.

It would be cruel to expect this of a person who is without a home, but for those who are only without a reliable roof a few days a year, it is a good lesson.

Rabbi Fishman: Kabbalistic texts call the sukkah the "shelter of faith." The Torah teaches us to be careful at precisely this moment, as we are bidden to leave our security and enter into a realm of faith and hope. Dwelling in such a structure metaphorically draws our gaze upward, as if to say that through the thin covering of the sukkah lies our true security.

Never have we needed the message of the sukkah more. We are reminded of what grounds us and gives us the humility to make our way in this world – that we are not alone, that we can find protection, that as fragile as life seems to be, it is that very fragility which allows us to celebrate.

Rabbi Splansky: In Israel, it is common for palm branches to be used for schach. In Canada, it's pine. In Indiana, it's corn stalks. Meanwhile, a California vintner named Benyamin Cantz uses old vines from his vineyard.

Cantz asks, if we use the leftovers from our fields and forests for schach, what does God use for the roof of God's sukkah? He suggests that perhaps God uses the discarded human sins left over from the Ten Days of Repentance.

Nothing goes to waste and nothing is without a purpose. The husks of our transgressions are made holy and given purpose. ■

The miseducation of Alex Johnstone

How can you not know about Auschwitz? I mean, really.

And yet, there was Alex Johnstone, NDP candidate in the Ontario riding of Hamilton West-Ancaster-Dundas, admitting last week she had no knowledge of the most infamous Nazi death camp, a place where more than one million people died during the Holocaust.

Never heard of it, she told the media, after an intrepid reporter unearthed a 2008 Facebook comment in which she jokingly compared the electrified fence posts surrounding Auschwitz to, of all things, a penis. (She also managed to spell "Polish" incorrectly.)

People make mistakes, sure. And seeing as we've only just finished atoning for our own errors, perhaps we can forgive Johnstone's, too. But her ignorance should not go unchecked, and if Ontario's education curriculum – which Johnstone is surely familiar with, given her years of service as a school trustee – failed to clue her in to what happened at the hellhole that was Auschwitz, then perhaps the Jewish community can assist.

And who better to take on the task than an actual Auschwitz survivor?

So, Ms. Johnstone, allow me to introduce you to Max Eisen.

Eisen was deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau in the Hungarian transports of 1944. His family was murdered there and in the Majdanek death camp. Out of approximately 60 family members, only three survived the concentration camps.

For the last 22 years, Max has been speaking about his experiences at Auschwitz on behalf of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre in Toronto, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, and Names, Not Numbers, among other groups. He talks to elementary, high school and university students, police officers and politicians about the horrors he witnessed. A few years back, he even made a presentation at Hamilton City Hall.

Auschwitz was a place of brutality and dehumanization, Eisen told me over the phone last week. "You were fortunate to live from second to second... One minute was like 1,000 years."

"There were no quarters given to anybody," he said. "You were either being starved to death or beaten to death, or for sure you went to the gas chambers.

"I have seen the worst that barbarians can dish out," he added. "I've seen it. I've smelled it."

Eisen himself almost didn't live to tell of the destruction he witnessed. He said he was "barely hanging on" when an American tank unit liberated him on May 6, 1945. So when I told Eisen about Johnstone, he just couldn't believe it. "For us survivors to hear this is very painful," he admitted. "To claim ignorance – you can't tell me that."

The good news is there is no shortage of material to help fill in Johnstone's Auschwitz blind spot – documentaries, memorials, testimonials. Eisen suggests that she read Elie Wiesel or Primo Levi. (Eisen's own memoir is set for release next year.)

"Let her sit in on a few sessions of high school Holocaust education," he recommended. "There are so many ways to get educated. There's no excuse."

And if all that isn't enough to correct the miseducation of Alex Johnstone, Eisen has one more idea.

"I would be more than happy to educate her," he says. ■ — YONI

REFLECTIONS

Like father, like son

Michael Coren

My father would never have considered himself a symbol of the Anglo-Canadian experience. Actually, he'd probably have wondered what the hell you were talking about. Not that he was lacking in intelligence. Far from it. He was intensely sharp, eager for knowledge, widely travelled and well-read.

One of his childhood friends was playwright Harold Pinter – they attended Hackney Jewish Youth Club together – but while Pinter went on to win the Nobel Prize for Literature, Phil Coren became a cab driver. Dad picked Pinter up once in London's West End. They hadn't seen one another in years, and Pinter said, "You know Phil, you're in the honest profession. Mine is just a sham."

Dad was a working-class Jew from tough, rough Hackney in London. He left school at 15 and two years later was in the Royal Air Force's Bomber Command. The idea of someone from his class and ethnic background going to university was laughable.

He boxed as a boy – a lot of Jewish kids did back there and back then – and made a name for himself with his fists in the RAF and then after the war as a gifted amateur. Phil Coren was quick, good-looking, streetwise and, after the clawing terror of war, bored and restless.

Like many men of his age, he couldn't settle down and decided to see more of the world. First was New York and then, because of visas and his British passport, he came up to Toronto for a long-term stay. He worked at Eaton's and at the job interview was asked about the origins of his name. It was code of course, from people who still embraced a cultural anti-Semitism. But Phil Coren's cockney accent confused them, and when he said his family had originally been Irish Protestant Corcorans, nobody seemed the wiser.

> Phil Coren was quick, good-looking, streetwise and, after the clawing terror of war, bored and restless.

It was all the more absurd in that on Sundays, he wasn't at a Presbyterian church but playing semi-professional soccer for a local Jewish team.

He left Canada in late 1950 and never returned. When I was a boy, he sometimes spoke of the "good times" in Toronto and Ottawa, and how rich everybody seemed compared to postwar Britain, but he never gave us many details. It was as though there was something painful at the core of it all.

In 1986, I was invited to deliver a lecture at the University of Toronto, met a beautiful young woman, fell in love and married her a year later. Thus son followed father to Canada, except this time the move was permanent. But we were married in a Roman Catholic church, and dad simply wouldn't attend the wedding and never visited us in Canada. Mum came over, and we went to Britain. That was the best it was going to be.

Then in 2000 he suffered a stroke. This fit, active man suddenly had the vitality trashed and thrashed out of him. It broke my heart watching him fight to form words, to walk and to be. Yet from that oppressor came a strange liberation. He said he would visit us. Mum and dad, my parents, flew to Canada, and for three weeks we showed Phil Coren his old haunts and arranged meetings with some of his old buddies.

He'd lived on Spadina Avenue all those years ago, and we drove up and down that long, changed road until he said, "Here, it was here." He got out of the car, walked for a few moments, and then put his head in his hands and began to cry. I hugged him, told him it was OK. He looked at me and said, "I left it too long. I've left it too long."

The last I saw my dad alive was at the end of that trip, as he walked arm in arm with my mother through the departure gate at Pearson Airport in Toronto. A few days later, he had a second stroke, fell badly, and died in hospital shortly afterwards.

After his funeral in London, I went back to my parents' home, where I had grown up, and I sat in his room and wept. I had to sort through his papers and was constantly jolted into tears as I read notes and letters and saw photographs showing how proud he was of my family. Why, then, couldn't he have broken through the old feelings and visited us earlier?

Then I understood.

In an old box file were keepsakes from half-a-century ago. At the bottom, as though hidden, was a photograph of a young Phil Coren with his arm around a lovely young woman. As I looked closer, I realized they were standing in front of the Toronto house in which he had lived. Attached to the photo with a rusted paperclip was a letter.

"It just can't happen Phil. I am so sorry. My parents don't hate Jews, but you're not Catholic, and if I married you, they would never speak to me again. I can't do that to them, and I can't do that to me. It would never work. I'm sorry."

There was no name, no address and I've no idea who she was. Yes, I have tried to find out. I do, though, now know why he felt the way he did and why he wouldn't visit.

Did he leave it too long? I don't know and I will never judge. What I do know is that I miss him very much indeed and that every time I walk or drive by that part of Spadina, I have to fight back tears. ■

Grieving for the home I once knew and loved

Jews once prospered in Iran. But after the Islamic Revolution, things changed, and escape became the only option

SIMA GOEL
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The aroma of jasmine and roses always makes my heart pound. The delicate scents remind me of the Persia of my childhood – Shiraz, splendid with its gardens and fountains, its public buildings decorated with Persian calligraphy.

But Islamic Iran is a different place from the one I hold in my heart. Ever since the arrival of the mullahs in 1979, Friday lunchtime prayers have always preached one basic message: Death To America! Death to Israel! Death to England! The Islamic government led by the Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, has clearly and repeatedly expressed its intentions. I grieve for my country of birth and for the havoc it wishes to unleash.

Iranians know their history. They remember that Persia was once the largest empire in the world. They understand power and politics. Iranians saw how, in the 1970s, America and its allies offered weapons and training to Afghan mujahideen in their conflict against the Russians. They also observed how those same rebels later used those weapons against the Americans themselves. When members of the Iranian-Islamic government declare, "Death to America!" it is not rhetoric. They mean it. And history shows that they do what they say they will. We must take the message seriously.

I was born in Iran. I know the country and I love its people. During the reign of the Shah, the Jewish community prospered. He was good for us, and we were good for him. At the time, there were no university quotas for Jews. We could learn, and work in professions that suited us. We had Jewish schools, kosher shops and synagogues. In the late 1970s, there were 100,000 Iranian Jews, and as long as we avoided politics, we had a place.

Although under the Shah we prospered, the old claws of anti-Semitism still scarred us. At the age of six, I had my own interaction with this evil. As I played with a new friend in the park, the girl's mother recognized that I was a Jew. She pulled my friend away, muttering, "Najest – dirty, impure Jew." I still cringe, remembering this experience. Under the Shah, the word of a Jew was equal to that of a Muslim in court. But on the playground, the narrow-minded dictated their own rules.

After the revolution, life changed dramatically.

Muslim principals replaced the Jewish ones at Jewish schools, and Shabbat was no longer a respected holiday. It became difficult to import religious items because the trade in religious objects suggested to the paranoid government an alliance with Israel. All Iranian women, including Jewish ones, were obliged to wear the hijab. The government slowly rescinded many of the social advances made by the Shah in his effort to bring Iran in to the modern age.

After Iran became an Islamic state, we lost the comparative ease we enjoyed in former years. Schools edited references to female poets and social scientists. Modern music was forbidden, as was classical. Fanatics often took the law into their own hands to police social behaviour. The testimony of a Jew in court became worth only half of that of a Muslim.

Rumours circulated, serving to frighten people into accepting draconian changes. Was it true that women who showed too much hair could have acid thrown in their faces?

Nobody dared take a chance, and so half the country swathed itself in robes.

The atmosphere of fear was part of an effective strategy to obtain compliance.

Throughout history, Iranian Jews had lived under different rulers and ideologues. We adapted to the most difficult of circumstances, always remembering that the bodies of our ancestors lay mouldering in the soil long before the first Muslims ever stepped foot in rich and beautiful Iran.

But here, on the other side of the world where I live openly as a Jew, I look to the politicians for guidance and protection, and I am dumbfounded. I cannot believe that we have offered the Islamic Iranian government access to nuclear technology and have removed the economic sanctions they loathed. It's a comedy; it's a circus; it can't be real that we give to this international bully the most brutal and dangerous ammunition ever created. Many believe that the mullahs will funnel the new money into supporting terrorism, and with their nuclear capacity, destabilize the whole world.

Because I needed freedom as much as I needed oxygen, I fled Iran at 17, risking my life for the unknown rather than accepting the mullahs' doctrines. When I look back at the time before the revolution, it seems as if I had once lived in a story in The Thousand and One Nights of Scheherazade. In those distant days, I walked with my father on narrow streets. Behind the high walls, families lived together and prayed for peace. I could hear the laughter of happy voices and the echo of traditional music.

It was a life where we expressed ourselves softly in public places and with confidence in our homes.

We were as much a part of the country as the stones in the hills. We were Iranian Jews of Shiraz.

That life is gone.

As the Jewish year begins anew, we are grateful for the blessings we have already received and for the abundance that surrounds us. But for the sake of our children and the generations to come, we must safeguard these gifts. If we cannot take back the access to nuclear technology from the Iranians, then at the least we must share our thoughts with our leaders and make them understand that this deal is foolhardy and can never advance the cause of peace and stability.

Roses and jasmine need fertile ground, gentle breezes and peace if they are to grow. So do our children. ■

Eglinton-Lawrence debate stays polite and collegial

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

If the near-capacity crowd at the Beth Torah Congregation was expecting fireworks at an Eglinton-Lawrence candidates debate Sept. 21, they may have left a little disappointed.

There was nary a Donald Trump among the hopefuls vying to represent the riding in the Oct. 19 election. Instead, spectators were treated to a polite debate, respectful collegiality and a recitation of each party's talking points on the issues. The partisan crowd did its part, providing ovations for their candidates at various points.

There were no knock-out punches in the debate, which featured Liberal Marco Mendicino, the NDP's Andrew Thomson and Tory MP and Finance Minister Joe Oliver.

Rabbi Yossi Sapirman moderated with questions on various topics, including relations with Israel, the anti-Israel boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, anti-Semitism, the danger posed by Iran, the economy, affordable housing, refugees and First Nations.

The event was sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada as part of its IMPACT 2015: National Debate Series, which features debates in ridings with large Jewish populations in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg.

On Israel, each of the Eglinton-Lawrence candidates emphasized their personal and their party's strong support. Mendicino began by professing his party's and leader Justin Trudeau's "unequivocal support of Israel." He called the Jewish state "a friend [and] ally" that shares Canadian values and is the only democracy in a volatile region.

He credited Prime Minister Stephen Harper for standing with Israel and said "it will be no different under Justin Trudeau."

Oliver said the Tories' strong support of Israel would continue. He referred to Canada's UN voting record, saying it was more supportive of Israel than when the Liberals held power. How can the Liberals be trusted, he asked, "particularly when the Liberal leader says one thing to the Jewish community and another to the Iranian community?"

Mendicino interjected, saying the remark was "beneath the dignity of your office," and Israel should not be "a wedge issue."

Referring to the BDS movement, Oliver said "we will oppose any attempt to undermine [Israel's] economic viability and the ability to defend itself."

Mendicino said Trudeau had helped defeat a BDS proposal at McGill University, his alma mater. He said that as a prosecutor in the 2010 Toronto 18 case, in which a number of young men were charged with plotting terrorist crimes, he understands the security concerns of the Jewish community. The accused were driven by hatred for the Canadian way of life, including fundamental freedoms. "What the case taught me is that you cannot enjoy those liberties unless you are secure," he said.

Thomson, who held several senior portfolios in the New Democratic government of Lorne Calvert in Saskatchewan, including finance minister, said NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair told him "there is absolutely no doubt that Israel has the right to exist and be recognized," Thomson said.

Turning to the BDS movement, Thomson said "we are of course opposed to that."

He said the NDP would like to see the re-introduction of a law to address Internet hate, likely referring to the repeal of Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

On the recent Iran deal, designed to delay that country's nuclear program by 10 years, Thomson said the key to it is "verification every step of the way... I am skeptical of the deal with Iran." As to the suggestion Canada resume normal relations with Iran, he said "we believe at this point the best we should seek with the Iranians is to provide consular services within the country."

"Iran is an existential threat to Israel," Mendicino stated. "It is within its constitution, and this is deeply problematic."

He pointed to Iranian support for Hezbollah and Hamas, two terrorist organizations, and said Iran cannot be trusted. But the P5+1 deal is not based on trust, he said. "It is based on verification." The Liberal party would not lift sanctions unless there is verification of the deal, he added.

Oliver noted that his government suspended diplomatic relations with Iran in 2012 and has designated the Iranian Revolutionary Guards a terrorist organization.

Trudeau wants to re-establish full diplomatic relations "before Iran does anything to redress its appalling record on human rights," Oliver said, adding that a Tory government would retain sanctions connected to Iran's human rights record.

Oliver and Mendicino clashed, mildly, when the latter claimed Trudeau had said the Liberals would consider reopening Canada's embassy in Iran if Iran complies with conditions attached to the P5+1 deal. Oliver said Trudeau didn't make reopening the embassy conditional on anything.

Much of the debate was about economic policy. Oliver said the Tories were best positioned to steer the economy through turbulent times, while Mendicino said the Liberals would invest heavily in infrastructure and cut taxes to the middle class, and Thomson said the NDP would balance the budget and cut small business taxes.

During the exchange on the economy, Oliver corrected Mendicino's statement that oil was priced around $30 a barrel (it's $47, he noted) and later pointed out, to counter Mendicino's claim that he wasn't a strong enough advocate for his own community, that the Tories pledged $2.6 billion to Toronto for the SmartTrack transit program. He also said his last budget allocated $42 million to Baycrest to create the Canadian Centre for Aging and Brain Health Innovation. ■

What really are our community's priorities?

Mira Sucharov

In time for the new year, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has published its list of priorities. There are several takeaways from the process.

Through an online survey and in-person focus groups, CIJA asked Canadian Jews to signal which issues the organization should prioritize in its advocacy efforts. The survey – provided to me by CIJA staff at my request, though I recall filling it out when it was issued – provided a dozen or so options, ranging from issues related to anti-Semitism; affordable housing and poverty relief; religious freedom, minority rights; positive Israel education; countering the boycotts, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel; Holocaust education; the cost of Jewish education; immigration and refugee issues; protecting Jewish students on campus; and enhancing security at Jewish institutions.

The results, published on the CIJA website, also form a long list including protecting Jewish students on campus, strengthening Canada-Israel friendship and "maintaining Canadian pressure on Iran," ensuring a "fair and efficient refugee system," providing affordable access to kosher products and Jewish education, fighting anti-Semitism and protecting human rights (including accountability for "war crimes, genocide, torture and crimes against humanity,"), ensuring adequate security for Jewish community institutions, preventing terrorism, affordable housing, and securing restitution for Holocaust survivors.

Gleaning the difference between the two lists is an exercise in fine detective work, compounded by the fact that CIJA has not specified how these priorities were actually ranked by respondents.

The survey results also do little to clarify respondents' specific policy preferences around these issues. Regarding Israel, for example, there are many unanswered questions. Would respondents prefer that CIJA ask the government to push Israel more vocally on settlements, or should the government to remain silent? Should the Canadian government actively back a two-state solution or remain passive in its approach? Should Canada pair its support for Jewish refugee return with the Palestinian refugee issue or decouple them? Similarly, preventing terrorism could mean supporting controversial legislation such as Bill C-51, or it could mean a variety of other more globally focused policy measures.

Perhaps most importantly, what some may not realize is that CIJA doesn't intend to represent the Jewish community at large. CIJA's core funding comes from the network of federations. And as Shimon Koffler Fogel, CEO of CIJA, told me in an email interview, while CIJA did receive some feedback from outside of the federation system, CIJA does "not claim to represent the totality of Jewish Canada" and instead aims to "advance the public policy interests of the organized Jewish community," which CIJA defines as the "tens of thousands of Jewish Canadians affiliated with their local federation," whether by donation or by volunteering.

The lesson here is that if one wants to have a voice in CIJA's affairs, one should become a federation donor or volunteer. Conversely, if one objects to CIJA's policy approach and feels it's beyond changing, one should keep in mind that providing a donation to federation's annual campaign also entails funding CIJA.

For those who value open dialogue, one should recall that CIJA's record is mixed, but nevertheless shows signs of improvement. On one hand, as I wrote in Ha'aretz in 2012, CIJA has at times stymied dialogue, as when the organization advised local Hillel chapters not to meet with noted analyst Peter Beinart on his three-city tour in 2012. On the other hand, last year CIJA hosted a debate between Yoram Hazony and me on the issue of Israel's Jewish nation-state bill, a forum that indeed lent itself to a healthy exchange of ideas around Israeli policy.

CIJA has the right to survey people however it wishes. But this process reminds us that, unlike with our Jewish neighbours to the south, we Canadian Jews – whether affiliated with a federation or not – have an unfortunate dearth of good, solid polling data on specific political attitudes on a range of issues. ■

We must respond to lies

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Odious statements by the world's despots are not new to us. For example, every manner of calumny and mistruth against Israel has been placed on the record at the United Nations. Though false, the remarks are seldom challenged, except by Israel.

There are many reasons for diplomats, politicians and journalists to let monstrous lies pass unchallenged: fear of standing out, geopolitical considerations, the risk of jeopardizing commercial ties,ennui, laziness, ignorance or, at times, shared belief.

But when earnest, civilized individuals and countries fail to challenge deliberate mendacity, deceit merely sinks its roots deeper and deeper into the soil of moral society, poisoning and strangling what is so vital to our way of life: the courage to confront the tyrant.

Two recent examples of inexcusable silence in the face of false, self-serving and repugnant statements illustrate the point, much to our collective shame.

Ever since the P5+1 nations signed the nuclear weapons agreement with Iran, European officials have nearly fallen over each other vying to meet with their Iranian counterparts to secure business with the imminently sanctions-free country. At one such meeting last month in Tehran with the new Hungarian ambassador, Iranian President Hassan Rouhani chose to comment on the influx of Syrian refugees then massing on Hungary's borders.

"We are happy that some European countries made positive efforts to help refugees, and we hope other European countries that do not have this position compensate on shortcomings," Rouhani said. The latter part of the statement was a transparent criticism of the government of Hungary for its equivocal policies toward the fleeing Syrians.

We can only imagine how the Hungarian envoy felt as he stood in the ornately decorated room, not responding to the offensively condescending disparagement aimed at him by Rouhani. For the envoy knew the truth that everyone else knows about the Syrian refugees: it is Iranian military and Iranian surrogates – Hezbollah – along with Assad's loyalists, who have directly caused the displacement of some 11 million Syrians and more than four million of them to flee the country. Apart from the Syrian strongman himself, Iran more than any other nation on earth is responsible for the plight of the unfortunate Syrians. Iran arms, protects, props up and directs Syrian President Bashar Assad. Most experts and observers long ago concluded that Assad would have long ago been defeated, or would have long ago fled, but for the intervention of Iran on his side.

As Charles Krauthammer noted, "most of the refugees are not fleeing the Islamic State. Its depravity is more ostentatious, but it is mostly visited upon minorities, Christian and Yazidi – and they have already been largely ethnically cleansed from Islamic State territory. The European detention camps are overflowing with Syrians fleeing Assad's barbarism, especially his attacks on civilians, using artillery, chlorine gas and nail-filled barrel bombs."

Iran underwrites "Assad's barbarism." Assad openly acknowledges and pays tribute to the Iranian rulers for their assistance to him. Without Iran's brutality and duplicity, it is safe to say, there would not be the Syrian refugee crisis that there is today. Yet Rouhani felt no personal compunction in chiding the Hungarian government's response to the current refugee situation.

Nor did the Syrian tyrant, Assad, look embarrassed when he told Russian journalists a few weeks ago that the West was responsible for creating the refugee crisis. This was caused, he claimed, by the West's support for "terrorists." Wrapping himself metaphorically in the shredded flag of Syrian democracy, he insisted that he would not step down from the government. He actually claimed the support of the Syrian people. No western journalist or government official rebuked Assad for his exculpatory fantasy.

The Iran-Assad alliance has wrought murder and misery to the Syrian people. This is the simple, painful truth that no outrageous and misleading statements can obscure. ■

The five per cent day school tuition solution

Rabbi Jay Kelman

With the busy Yom Tov season, I wouldn't be surprised if many missed what is potentially the most significant Jewish news story of the year. I'm referring to the announcement that four Jewish day schools in New Jersey will be capping tuition fees at a maximum of 18 per cent of income, regardless of the number of children in a family.

This new program, which is in addition to any tuition breaks already in place for lower-income families, is aimed at middle-class families – those earning between $150,000 and $325,000, an income level many can only dream of, yet doesn't allow many to pay the crippling costs of tuition. This initiative is being made possible by a gift from the Gottesman Family Foundation. Even better, each of the four schools involved have enhanced the program by capping tuition at even lower rates for those earning "only" in the $250,000 range.

This initiative will first and foremost lower the burden for those who desire the basic right to give their children a Jewish education. The enormous cost of day school education not only prevents many from attending, it has caused many Jewish babies not to be born. While there is little statistical information available, it's well known among middle-income families that day school tuition is the best form of birth control.

In addition, this marks an important shift in thinking about funding Jewish education. Sadly, too many feel the cost should be borne by those who use the system. This isn't how the public system is funded, nor should it be how Jewish education is funded. As Paula Gottesman stated, "Just as people pay taxes for public schools – and no one would say we shouldn't do that – the Jewish community should tax itself for the education of our children. Our collective future should be the responsibility of the collective community."

What is good for New Jersey is good for Canada, and especially Toronto. Not only does Toronto have the largest Jewish community in Canada, but in four other provinces, the government funds much of the Jewish day schools' general education program, resulting in much lower, albeit still much too high, tuition. This may go a long way toward explaining why in Toronto, 32 per cent of Jewish children attend Jewish day schools, compared to almost 60 per cent in Montreal. While a similar program was launched at Toronto's Robbins Hebrew Academy capping tuition at 15 per cent of income, it was limited to those with three children at RHA and didn't include high school, making its practical impact extremely limited.

I'd like to propose a variation of the New Jersey model, though I'd be thrilled if that model were adopted here. Let's cap tuition at five per cent of income, regardless of the number of children per family. At the same time, families who benefit would be asked to purchase a $1-million life insurance policy. Over time, thousands of policies would yield billions of dollars. At the same time, I call upon everyone in the community – whether or not you have, or had, children in the day school system – to commit to contributing via insurance or one of many other methods to help support this much-needed initiative.

To get this program started, I urge leading philanthropists to provide bridge financing – either by grant or by way of a loan – to allow the program time to become self-sufficient. The enormous wealth in our community makes this very doable.

Change can only come from public pressure, so whether you're a day school parent willing to purchase a life insurance policy in exchange for greatly reduced tuition or a concerned community member who cares about Jewish education and want to contribute, please email me at rabbijay@torahinmotion.org. I look forward to receiving at least 1,000 emails in the coming days, to ensure that real and permanent changes are in the offing. ■

Cultural differences can strengthen us

Norma Baumel Joseph

Names identify us. They do so for both the individual and the group. We are called Jews – it's an immediately known particularity. It enables others to locate us on a spectrum with which they are familiar. Equally, it enables us to communicate with each other.

However, that one word belies our distinctions and specific characteristics. It also creates a set of assumptions on the part of both insiders and outsiders of unity – or worse – uniformity.

We are not one, fundraising slogans to the contrary. Our differences are important keys to group identities, culture and history. They should not be erased. Diversity signals dynamism of community and a wealth of tradition.

Some of us are known through our denominational affiliation. Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, Orthodox – these names designate certain ritual practice and synagogue affiliations. They also indicate a decidedly North American context. They do not necessarily operate in Europe or even in Israel as identifiers. Other nomenclatures locate geographical or national associations such as American Jew or Italian Jew. Some are called Ashkenazi or Sephardi Jews. Some are associated with distinct chassidic sects. The Jew part is not all-encompassing, correspondingly applicable: it does not equalize us.

In ancient Israel, we were known as the Israelites. This signified a tribal or familial location. The children of Israel were literally supposed to be Jacob's descendants. But many outsiders attached themselves to the community and there were significant internal divisions.

Each part of a name locates a group and sources its cultural patterns. Paying attention to these discrete classifications enables healthier interactions and effective communication.

Iraqi Jews came to Canada in 1951 and knew themselves to be Arab Jews. But when they got to North America or Israel, they were quickly informed that one could not be an Arab and a Jew. For people from the Middle East, the operating distinction was Muslim, Christian or Jew. The basic category Arab referred to the shared cultural context and spoken language of the varying communities. They surely knew they were not all the same; differences were clear. But the Jews, who lived in these countries and had lived there for over 2,000 years, shared all the cultural elements of Arab life. They ate the same foods, negotiated life in the same fashion and lived fully accepting their place in this multiplicity. They did not speak Yiddish nor eat gefilte fish. And they still don't.

> We are not one, fundraising slogans to the contrary

Their ruptured and dislocated recent history uprooted their sense of self and identities were torn asunder. In accepting the western style of thinking that everything is a binary of conflict, of Arab versus Jew, we have added to their disarticulation.

We should not ask people to dissolve their identities in order to facilitate neat borders or clear groupings. We should learn more about the shared cultural conditions that led to such identifications.

To be an Arab Jew does not indicate a clash of civilizations. Rather, becoming aware of the ethnic and religious diversity of the Middle East might open up our horizons and prevent stereotyping that is detrimental to interrelationships. We rid ourselves of this constant oppositional state of mind. It is not always a matter of us versus them. Sometimes "us" lived amongst "them" and the coexistence created a flourishing civilization.

Maybe the world needs to learn that competing binaries are not the only pattern available. We can think in multiple forms and share cultural complexities. Most importantly, we must recognize the wealth of the Middle Eastern Jewish world, its cultural richness and significant contributions. Iraqi Jews were indigenous to the country and they contributed to the life, history, economy, arts and theatre of their country. They were Arab Jews. ■

MP calls graffiti slamming Harper 'anti-Semitic'

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Graffiti that suggests a vote for Prime Minister Stephen Harper is a vote for Nazism was discovered Sept. 21 in front of a Bathurst Manor home.

The messages spray-painted on the road in front of 178 Codsell Ave., said, "Stop Harper," "Death = Harper," as well as an image of a swastika beside the symbol and word "= Harper."

Mark Adler, the Conservative candidate for York Centre – the riding that encompasses the Bathurst Manor neighbourhood, which is home to many Jews, including many Holocaust survivors – released a statement following the discovery of the graffiti that condemned it as anti-Semitic.

"I am deeply disturbed by the appalling anti-Semitic graffiti in the Bathurst Manor area, which trivializes the Holocaust, denigrates the memory of Holocaust victims, and is highly offensive to the ethnically and religiously diverse members of the Conservative party," Adler said.

"Moreover, the timing of this odious graffiti is deplorable as Jews across Canada prepare for Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement and holiest day in the Jewish calendar, during which time Jews strive for personal peace that will help make the world a better place for all."

> The timing of this odious graffiti is deplorable as Jews across Canada prepare for Yom Kippur

Sara Lefton, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' vice-president for the Greater Toronto Area, also condemned the graffiti.

"Nazi analogies are inappropriate, offensive, and disrespectful to all Canadians, particularly Holocaust victims, survivors and their families. Graffiti like this has no place in the Canadian political process and should be condemned by all Canadians," Lefton said.

When contacted by The CJN, Adler's campaign manager declined to comment further, referring back to the statement. ■

Gaffes and 'anti-Semitism' on the campaign trail

Daniel Wolgelerenter

In the Sept. 17 Globe and Mail leaders' debate, Prime Minister Stephen Harper made reference to "old-stock Canadians" in defending his government's policy on health care for refugees and immigrants, saying it had only denied care to bogus claimants.

"We do not offer them a better health-care plan than the ordinary Canadian can receive," Harper said. "I think that's something that both new and existing and old-stock Canadians can agree with."

Critics pounced, calling it either a lapse that showed Harper's true racist colours or a deliberate, coded dog whistle to his intolerant party core.

But if you watched the debate, it was clear Harper was searching for a way to express how both new and old Canadians might agree with his policy. By the next day, he clarified that the phrase referred to "Canadians who have been the descendants of immigrants for one or more generations."

Under that definition, with four European-born grandparents, I and many other Jews qualify. As such, Walrus editor Jonathan Kay was right to say the comment was no big deal.

"Yes, 'old-stock' is a fusty phrase, offensive to some. But it's idiotic the way the media is acting like Harper used the n-word or something," Kay tweeted Sept. 20. "In fact: is there an example of a right-wing [political] party, in any country, so decisively opening itself up to immigrant groups as Harper's?"

At worst, the prime minister was guilty of using an inelegant expression that's more prevalent in nationalist discourse – similar phrases are common in Quebec – than everyday political parlance.

Speaking of criticizing Harper, on Sept. 21, York Centre MP Mark Adler issued a statement decrying "anti-Semitic" graffiti spray-painted on a street in a Jewish area of his Toronto riding. They were: "Stop Harrper" (sic), "Death = Harper," and an image of a swastika beside the words "= Harper."

"I am deeply disturbed by the appalling anti-Semitic graffiti in the Bathurst Manor area, which trivializes the Holocaust, denigrates the memory of Holocaust victims, and is highly offensive to the ethnically and religiously diverse members of the Conservative party," wrote Adler, who is, famously, the son of a Shoah survivor.

"Moreover, the timing of this odious graffiti is deplorable as Jews across Canada prepare for Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement and holiest day in the Jewish calendar."

Anti-Semitic graffiti in a Jewish neighbourhood is indeed reprehensible, especially when it appears around an important Jewish holiday. The only problem is that the crude scrawlings were more anti-Harper than anti-Jewish.

Harper has been a vocal supporter of Israel and a friend to Jews for reasons that seem to transcend electoral considerations, but he's not actually Jewish. So while using swastikas in political debate is rhetorically juvenile – unless you're criticizing actual Nazis, and Harper isn't one at all – it's not anti-Semitic to make the comparison. It's just dumb.

Finally, over Yom Kippur came news that Alex Johnstone, the NDP candidate in Hamilton West-Ancaster-Dundas – and, disturbingly, current vice-chair of the Hamilton-Wentworth District School Board – apologized for making a penis joke about Auschwitz on a friend's Facebook page in 2008. She then admitted that up until the controversy erupted, she didn't know what Auschwitz was.

"Ahhh, the infamous Pollish [sic], phallic, hydro posts… of course you took pictures of this! It expresses… how the curve is normal, natural and healthy right!" she wrote about a picture of curved electrified fence posts around the death camp in a comment unearthed by a satirical website.

Johnstone, who is in her early 30s, seemed sincere when she told the Hamilton Spectator there was "no malice intended" in the remark. The bigger issue, however, is that although she said she'd "heard about concentration camps," it's disconcerting that a school trustee who wants to be an MP was ignorant about the most notorious killing ground in human history.

In 2011, Johnstone tweeted that it was "great to hear" Peel students were learning about the Holocaust, and in 2013, she tweeted about a Hamilton teacher who won an award for Holocaust education.

Perhaps she should do more than just tweet about the Shoah. ■

Tories condemn anti-Israel posters around Montreal

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Political posters around Montreal depicting a dead child on a beach and accusing Israel of killing Palestinian children and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of supporting it are causing outrage.

Over a photo of the lifeless child, the signs read in French: "Israel murders Palestinian children/ Harper applauds/ What do the other parties say?"

In small print are the names of four Palestinian boys who died in July 2014 while playing soccer on a beach allegedly killed by an Israeli air strike on the port of Gaza. It alleges that Israel closed a criminal investigation and no one has been found guilty.

The sponsor of the posters is identified as BDS Québec, paid and authorized by the Coalition pour la Justice et la Paix en Palestine.

The Conservative party issued a statement on Sept. 20 condemning the posters. "The Conservative Party of Canada is deeply disturbed by the anti-Israel boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) signs posted in the Montreal area. We strongly condemn these signs as further evidence of continued, deplorable efforts to delegitimize the State of Israel.

A poster is put up near Westmount Square.

"As we have said before, Canada will stand with Israel through fire and water… We will oppose any tactic to undermine Israel's legitimacy, economic viability, or right to defend herself in the face of terror."

Megan Murdoch, a spokesperson for the party, sent The CJN some photos of the posters. Two of them are on the same pole as New Democratic Party (NDP) candidates: Allison Turner in the riding of Ville Marie-Le Sud Ouest-Ile des Soeurs, outside Concordia University's downtown campus, and James Hughes of Notre Dame de Grâce-Westmount, near Westmount Square, where the Israeli Consulate is located.

NDP press secretary Mélanie Richer said the posters "have no association with any of the NDP candidates, nor have [they] anything to do with the NDP."

Murdoch said that there were also at least two posters near McGill University on Sherbrooke Street, another near de Maisonneuve Boulevard and Greene Avenue, and one outside the Adonis grocery store on Ste. Catherine Street. BDS activists have held earlier protests at that store because it sells Israeli hummus.

Mount Royal Conservative candidate Robert Libman said the posters have been posted in that riding as well. Calling them "revolting," he stated, "I strongly oppose the BDS movement."

According to information on its website, BDS Québec is supported by 27 groups, including such major unions as the Centrale des syndicats du Québec and the Fédération nationale des enseignantes et des enseignants, the Fédération des femmes du Québec, the student union Association syndicale pour une solidarité étudiante (ASSE), Independent Jewish Voices, and the political party Québec solidaire.

"We are absolutely disgusted by these signs," said Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs spokesperson Eta Yudin on Sept. 24. "When we learned about them we immediately contacted both the City of Montreal and Elections Canada to see if they violate municipal bylaws or the Elections Canada Act. While they do not appear to contravene municipal bylaws, Elections Canada is still assessing and we are waiting for a final response. We have also reached out to the federal political parties, each of which are on record opposing and condemning BDS."

Also on Sept. 24, former Liberal foreign affairs critic Marc Garneau, who is seeking re-election in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Westmount, tweeted: "This kind of divisive and hateful rhetoric has no place in Canada and no place in this campaign."

The Israeli Consulate General in Montreal stated that it is "appalled by the abuse of the Canadian election campaign to disseminate hateful slander about Israel. Support for Israel's right to exist and the defence of our civilian population against brutal terrorist attacks is the consensus in Canada and is certainly not a campaign issue." ■

Ex-foreign minister Baird campaigns for Tory hopeful

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Former foreign affairs minister John Baird had encouraging words for Mount Royal Conservative candidate Robert Libman, who according to one poll is trailing Liberal opponent Anthony Housefather.

In his first run for political office 20 years ago, Baird said he was in third place with just 3-1/2 weeks left in the campaign. But with a final push, he won his Ottawa-area provincial seat.

Baird, who resigned from cabinet in February and from Parliament the following month, spoke at a Sept. 24 campaign event for Libman at Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron coincidentally on the same day as a Mainstreet/Postmedia poll showed Libman 15 points behind Housefather, who had 39 per cent support.

"This riding can be won," said Baird.

Libman and his campaign organizers dismissed the poll as unreliable because the head of Mainstreet is a former president of the Liberal Party of Ontario.

Libman conceded the Mount Royal race is "very close" but said he viewed that poll result with skepticism.

"Our numbers are quite different," he said. "I know if we get out the vote, we will win." Mount Royal has been Liberal for 75 years.

Baird, 47, said he has admired Libman for his strong principles and courage to act on them since he co-founded and led the English-rights Equality Party to four seats in the National Assembly in 1989.

"[Prime Minister] Stephen Harper needs Robert Libman beside him at the cabinet table," Baird said. "Not only will he be a forceful voice for Mount Royal, but for all of the Montreal area."

None of the five Quebec seats the Conservatives held in the last Parliament are in the Montreal area.

About 175 people attended the public event at the Côte St. Luc synagogue. The congregation's Rabbi Reuben Poupko said his introduction should not be interpreted as an endorsement of Libman, as he believes he should not officially support any candidate.

However, he said Libman has been a good friend for some 30 years, and he praised his honesty and decency. "He does what is right when no one is around [...and] is deserving of all our support," he said.

Rabbi Poupko also said that Harper and Baird "deserve our gratitude. John Baird was the foreign minister of the Canadian government that has been most supportive of Israel ever. That's a fact that can't be denied, argued or debated."

Libman went even further and said no other government leader of any country has been as supportive of Israel since its creation.

Baird, who now works in the private sector, was praised for upholding the same moral convictions as Harper. He was particularly applauded by Libman for severing diplomatic relations with Iran in 2012 for its support of the Syria's Assad regime and Hezbollah and Hamas, and its vows to destroy Israel.

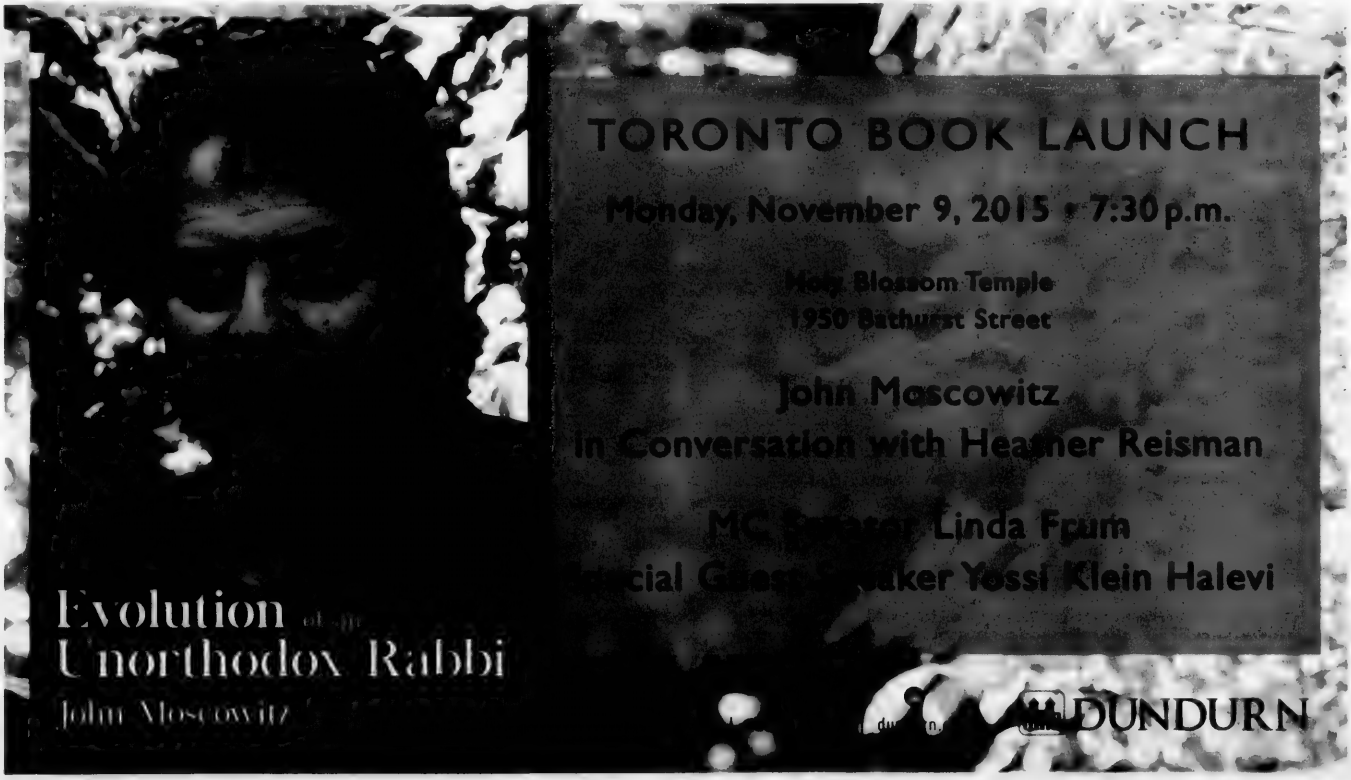
"The great struggle of our generation is the threat of international terrorism," Baird said, and "the Jewish People are far too often on the front line of that struggle." Canada must be unequivocal in confronting terrorism, he said, in much the same way earlier generations fought in the two world wars.

To those who say Canada has become too favourable to Israel and is no longer an "honest broker" in the Middle East, Baird said, "You're bloody right we're not. We have returned to what was our policy for many decades... We should not try to be a referee."

Canada, he said, enjoys greater respect in the Arab world today than it did 10 years ago, especially for its firm stance against Iran and in fighting ISIS.

Baird earlier attended a private fundraiser for Libman at a local car dealership. Among those present were three rabbis: Yonah Rosner of Congregation Shomrim Laboker, Asher Jacobson of Congregation Chevra Kadisha-B'nai Jacob, and Saul Emanuel, executive director of the Vaad Ha'ir.

Also that evening, Stephen Bronfman was at Housefather's campaign office to formally endorse his candidacy. Bronfman is on the national board of the Liberal party and is its chief revenue officer and was general chair of last year's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign in Montreal. ■



Comments on Jewish issues dog NDPers

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Two NDP hopefuls found themselves in hot water last week after old social media comments surfaced that critics said exposed the candidates' ignorance of Jewish issues.

Stefan Jonasson, who was running in Winnipeg's Charleswood–St. James–Assiniboia–Headingley riding, reluctantly resigned Sept. 24 after the True North Times, a satirical website that promised to expose controversial comments by nine politicians in nine days, dug up a three-year-old Facebook post in which he accused haredi Jews of offering "a toxic caricature of faith at odds with the spirit of the religious tradition they profess to represent." He added that they mistreat women and compared them to the Taliban and other extremists.

Following his resignation, Jonasson posted a message on Facebook that criticized True North Times and defended his post on haredim.

"A model of gutter journalism, this blog ridiculed some of my past social media posts and sought to create the false impression that I had offered a general indictment of Jewish people when, in fact, I was criticizing the misogynistic behaviour of a particular group of dogmatic believers," he wrote.

"I stand by my criticism of those who oppress women in the name of religion, and I'm disappointed that my party chooses not to stand with me."

NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair issued a brief comment about Jonasson's resignation, saying that Jonasson "clearly recognized that he had said something totally inappropriate and has withdrawn, and that's enough."

Earlier in the week, True North Times revealed that Alex Johnstone, the NDP candidate for Hamilton West-Ancaster-Dundas, made a penis joke in 2008 in a comment about a friend's Facebook picture, taken at the Auschwitz concentration camp museum, that featured an electric fence and its curved concrete supports.

"Ahhh, the infamous Pollish [sic], phallic, hydro posts," her comment read. "Of course you took pictures of this! It expresses how the curve is normal, natural, and healthy right!"

In an interview with the Hamilton Spectator, Johnstone, who is a Hamilton school trustee and vice chair of the Hamilton-Wentworth District School Board, claimed ignorance. "Well, I didn't know what Auschwitz was, or I didn't up until today," she said.

Johnstone has apologized for the post, saying, "While never intending any malice, this comment was clearly inappropriate. I would like to offer my unreserved apology."

She also reached out to Jewish groups, including B'nai Brith Canada.

Michael Mosytn, B'nai Brith's CEO, said when he spoke with her, she said "she was deeply troubled by the unwanted media attention and did not feel that public characterizations accurately reflected who she is as an individual… She committed, win or lose, to work with our B'nai Brith experts to further her personal knowledge of the Holocaust."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, said his organization has yet to be approached by Johnstone, but he invited her to take part in an educational trip for Canadian leaders to Auschwitz this month.

"It made sense for me to invite her and give her the opportunity to learn about Auschwitz and the Holocaust. She has not responded," he said.

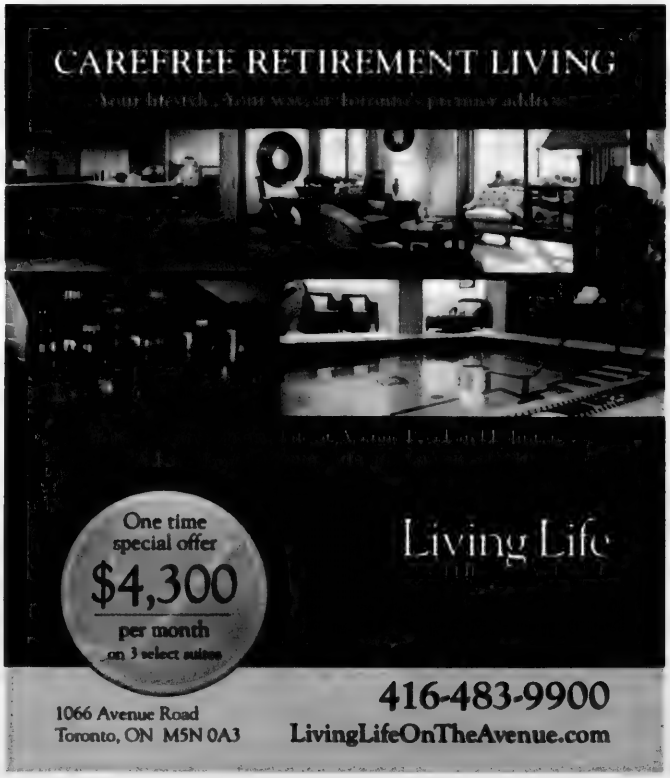
Regarding Jonasson's remarks about haredim and the Taliban, Benlolo said they were "horrific."

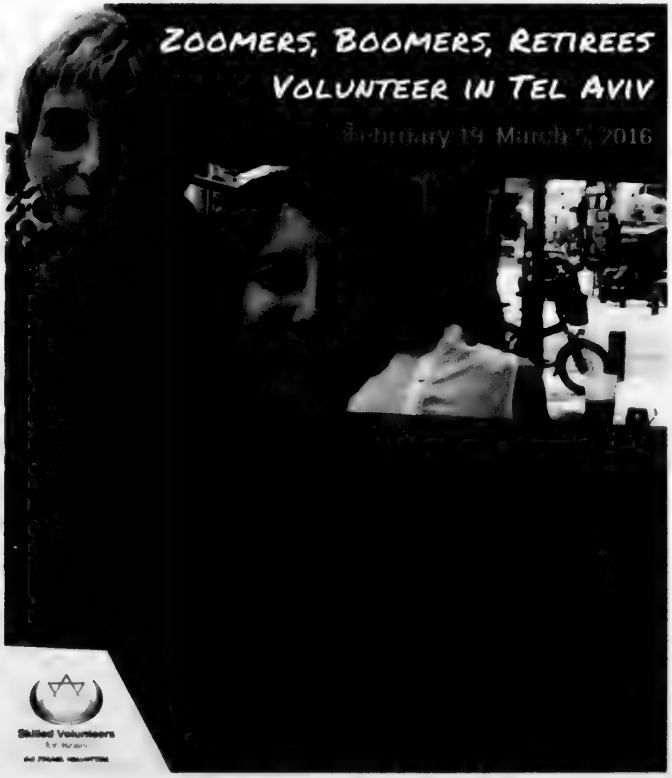
"Clearly, he doesn't understand the Taliban and the haredim, and the differences between the two groups. The Taliban is notorious for killing people in soccer stadiums and shooting women in the head. Comparing the Taliban to religious Jews is wrong and very disturbing, and shows he is quite ignorant."

Alex Johnstone

Mostyn said Jonasson's comments are offensive and factually incorrect. "The fact he even believes that haredi Jews are one homogenous group shows his absolute ignorance of the Jewish world… We applaud the NDP for pulling Mr. Jonasson's candidacy for these offensive views."

Benlolo chose not to reflect on whether Jonasson's resignation was necessary. "It's not my position to dictate whether political candidates should resign. I think people have to do the right thing, and the parties themselves have to decide who they want to have inside their parties as reflective of themselves." ■





Court dismisses defamation suit by CUPW

plungen@thecjn.ca

An Ontario court has dismissed a suit in which the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) alleged it was defamed by comments carried in a Sun TV broadcast and later in a Toronto Sun newspaper column, which suggested the labour group supported terrorism.

The Ontario Superior Court of Justice ruled in mid-summer that CUPW failed to give proper notice to the defendants, which included Sun Media Corporation, TVA Group, Quebecor Media, media personality Jerry Agar and Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

The court was ruling on a motion to dismiss the CUPW suit on the basis of lack of notice and because CUPW, as an un-incorporated entity, did not have the legal capacity to sue for libel.

Recounting the facts of the case, Judge Robert Pelletier noted that while CUPW did serve notice on the defendants, the notice was not specific enough to inform them about the particular comments that formed the subject of the suit.

Avi Benlolo

Jerry Agar

"I would conclude, therefore, that while the notices identified the matter complained of, they did not sufficiently specify the matter complained of, as was clearly possible... The notices provided were more in the nature of the plaintiff's interpretation of the words spoken and published than they were direct references to them."

The court also found that the issue of whether an unincorporated association can sue for defamation is specific to each case and is "an unsettled and burgeoning area of the law."

The case arose out of a July 24, 2014, television broadcast by the now defunct Sun television news network, operated by Sun News, and a July 28 article in the Toronto Sun. The TV segment was hosted by Agar and included an interview with Benlolo about a pro-Palestinian rally on Parliament Hill.

The July 24 TV segment was called Hamas, CUPW Flags Fly on Parliament Hill. The broadcast noted that CUPW banners were flown near Hamas flags and stated that Hamas is a designated terrorist organization in Canada.

CUPW alleged that the column written by Agar in the Toronto Sun, with the headline, "Hamas goes postal? Only in Canada," contained "many false, disparaging and defamatory statements about CUPW and its members."

Subsequently, the court noted, Sun News issued retractions and apologies, as did the Toronto Sun.

The retractions stated, "We regret and withdraw any suggestion that CUPW, or its members, are terrorist sympathizers or supporters of Hamas."

Benlolo's office declined to comment about the case.

In a response to a CJN inquiry, Agar stated, "I believe CUPW is appealing the decision."

Inquiries to Quebecor, and CUPW were not returned by The CJN's deadline. ■

FEDTalks kick off Vancouver's annual campaign

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

More than 700 members of Vancouver's Jewish community showed up for the annual campaign kickoff of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) Sept. 17.

The event, titled FEDtalks, featured short, TED-style talks from four speakers: retiring Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, Challah for Hunger founder Eli Winkelman, Appleseeds Academy CEO Dafna Lifshitz and well-known Los Angeles rabbi David Wolpe.

The speakers touched on the refugee and migrant crisis, caring for the hungry, helping those on the periphery of Israel and Jewish identity and values.

"Their messages are our messages, and they reflected the soul of who we are as a federation," said Ezra Shanken, federation CEO.

Cotler, a law professor, human rights lawyer and former justice minister, placed particular emphasis on the civil war in Syria, the refugee and migrant crisis it's caused and how the world can help.

"Behind every statistic is a human being. Behind every statistic is another Alan Kurdi," he said, referring to the toddler whose lifeless body made newspaper front pages around the world after he drowned in the Mediterranean as his family tried to reach safety. "While atrocities were unfolding in Syria, the international community was behaving as a bystander. The world dithered while Syrians died."

He also discussed the recent Iran nuclear deal and the Canadian Parliament's conclusions four years ago.

"Our foreign affairs subcommittee in the Canadian Parliament unanimously concluded that Iran had already committed the crime of incitement to genocide prohibited under the genocide convention. Yet as we meet, not one state in the international community has undertaken its obligations... to hold Iran to account for its state-sanctioned incitement to hate and to genocide."

Eli Winkelman, founder of Challah for Hunger, shared her story of turning the simple act of baking challah into an initiative for social justice.

"Having just returned from Israel, I started baking challah in my dorm kitchen," she recalled of the organization's beginnings at Scripps College in Claremont, Calif., in 2004. "Within a month we had a good handful of regular bakers coming back week after week and complaining that their friends were eating all their challah."

Dafna Lifshitz

Eventually she and her student friends were baking 50 to 100 challahs a week, selling them in a campus courtyard and donating the money. Today, on that same campus, they're selling up to 300 loaves a week, and Winkelman's organization has 90 chapters on university campuses in three countries.

She challenged the audience to think about the complexities of improving the world while living in it. "What do you value? How do your actions show what you value? How does your money and the way you spend it in the world help create a world that shares your values?" she asked.

Dafna Lifshitz, CEO of Appleseeds Academy, discussed how her organization tries to bridge the digital divide in Israel.

"There are 1,300 hundred start-ups in Tel Aviv. Nothing in Kiryat Shmona in the north. Nothing in Eilat in the south. What you see is not a start-up nation, it is a start-up metropolis," she told the crowd. "I believe Israel should be a start-up nation for all."

She highlighted three programs that are making a difference, including Net@, which delivers computer training, including certification from Cisco Systems, to at-risk youth in the Northern Galilee. This helps them get placement in elite IDF units, which in turn leads to highly-skilled well-paying civilian jobs, thus helping break the cycle of poverty one teen and one family at a time. The program is supported by the JFGV, whose partnership region is the Upper Galilee.

Rabbi Wolpe, spiritual leader of Sinai Temple in Los Angeles, referenced the refugee and migrant crisis with specific emphasis on the Jewish tradition of caring for those in need and on the power of collective giving.

"When we see tragedy and difficulty it mobilizes our energy like nothing else – and this is as old as Judaism," he said. "Sometimes, through the federation, you change the lives of people you don't know, and you change them forever." ■

Family uses basketball to raise funds for Bat Yam youth

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A month before his Sept. 26 bar mitzvah, Mitchell Rodney went to Bat Yam, Israel, to perform a pre-simchah mitzvah of his own.

Travelling with his family, the 13-year-old Thornhill native met the players of Maccabi Bat Yam's youth basketball team. Several players on the team are Ethiopian immigrants who live below the poverty line.

Many of those young players also rely on a $3,600 donation from Hoops Kids, the Toronto fundraiser that Mitchell and his family organize, to subsidize their gym fees.

"I wanted to know where the funds were going and I wanted to see, first-hand, the people and how [the money] has impacted their lives," Mitchell said.

Mitchell's older sister, Hallie, established Hoops Kids in 2011 as part of her bat mitzvah project. The fundraiser was a youth-oriented alternative to Hoops 4 Israel, a three-on-three basketball tournament for older teens and adults.

Since 2011, the Hoops Kids tournament has attracted more kids and donations. Mitchell took over as leader of Hoops Kids earlier this year. Funds raised help to buy bags, jerseys and other team necessities.

Children in Bat Yam often practise for up to 12 hours each week, often in high temperatures and gyms without air conditioning.

"They were very good basketball players," Mitchell told The CJN. "They were ranked 10th in Israel for their age group."

In 2007, Bat Yam, a Tel Aviv suburb, became a partner with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, with a focus on helping at-risk citizens. Laura Kindler, a federation representative in Bat Yam, said fundraising efforts by Canadian Jews to help those hovering around the poverty line are important.

"They appreciate it," Kindler said of the children from Bat Yam who receive these subsidies. "They know how the person who gave the gift lives so far away. How touched they are that somebody from Toronto... cares about them and thinks about them."

Since the partnership began eight years ago, Kindler said the area's Ethiopian immigrant population, whose members are aided by the Canadian fundraising efforts, has grown by nearly 300 families. Nevertheless, more than two-thirds of Ethiopian immigrants in Bat Yam live below the poverty line.

The Rodney family hopes they can keep contributing to the same sports-driven kids in Bat Yam, although future plans for Hoops Kids are still up for discussion. If it continues, corporate sponsorship could be a big help to boosting the fundraiser, said Jordan Rodney, Mitchell's dad.

Mitchell's mom, Julie, said getting children involved in charity events ensures they're not insular. "Jordan and I would say to [our kids], 'Sometimes you have to do things for other people and put what you want aside, and carve out time to give back,'" she said. "Hopefully, it keeps them a little less selfish and a little more giving."

She urged kids to sign up for federation's B'nai Tzedek bar and bat mitzvah program, which lets children set up an endowment fund and learn about philanthropy.

"Looking at these [Bat Yam] kids, I realized how fortunate I am," Mitchell said. "I've known my whole life that charity is wonderful. You have to give back. It's nice to give back to society." ■

Seeking better mental health? Take this test

plungen@thecjn.ca

Like a puzzle whose pieces continue to be assembled to reveal a larger picture, the brain divulges more and more of its secrets over time. Back when he was in medical school, the mind-body connection was not as well understood as it is today, said 66-year-old Dr. Sam Ozersky.

Today we know that mental illnesses, such as bipolar disorder, depression, schizophrenia and post-traumatic stress disorder can affect the physiology of the brain, in some cases shrinking its volume, as revealed in MRI scans. But it's also been learned that early treatment can help reverse that effect.

"The brain can recover," said Ozersky, a psychiatrist and senior consultant in mood disorders at the University Health Network (UHN). "The brain can heal itself within limits either through medication or certain forms of brain activity such as psychotherapy, physical exercise and brain exercise such as puzzles, Sudoko and crosswords.

"Yes, you can renovate your brain, provided it is not a 'tear down' situation and renovation is not extensive," he said.

The key is early intervention and that's where "Feeling Better Now" (FBN) comes in.

FBN is a web-based, mobile-ready early identification system developed by Mensante Inc., a company Ozersky founded in 2006.

It provides the user with a web-based platform that assesses an individual's mental health and recommends a course of action best suited to address the maladies people are suffering from.

"We're like a GPS to the best available care, whether self care, care by others such as counsellors and therapists, and care by medical practitioners," Ozersky said.

It's a service that's badly needed.

"Our experience over the past decade indicates that employees suffering mental health problems may not always turn to a doctor first. They may confide in their partners and families, seek out counselling through Employee Assistance Programs (EAP) and student counselling services, or choose to pursue options in self-directed care," he said.

"There is absolutely a need for a system to optimize mental health care delivery that is inexpensive and medically approved, Ozersky added.

With Feeling Better Now, which was updated earlier this year as FBN2, prospective patients take a test on their computers or mobile device. Their answers to the questions posed by FBN help the program diagnose the patient, assign different levels of risk and offer recommendations for treatment.

Assessments can take as little as 15-20 minutes to complete, even for those experiencing several mental health issues, which can include major depression, generalized anxiety, eating disorders and substance abuse.

"We don't do anything that isn't supported by the scientific literature," Ozersky said, noting that the College of Family Physicians of Canada has endorsed FBN as a practice tool and that the Ontario Medical Association has approved the program for its members' personal use.

"We tell them how to make contact with people who can help them explain what they should do. We provide a checklist of functions that the caregiver should be providing according to the best science."

The website also offers a "toolbox" of resources approved by Mensante's clinical advisory board. Among there are stress reduction tools, online and mobile cognitive behaviour therapy, Smartphone and tablet apps for mental health management and downloadable PDF workbooks to manage symptoms of poor mental health.

> Yes, you can renovate your brain, provided it is not a 'tear down' situation and renovation is not extensive

The upshot of that approach is that it gives the patient greater control over their own care.

"The website is driven by the patient," Ozersky said. "It helps the patient, caregivers and family members optimize the prevention, early diagnosis and treatment of mental disorders according to the best scientific evidence.

"We promote engagement by making them the centre of the care and letting them choose what suits them best."

Another benefit of the online tool is that it helps users avoid the stigma that can be attached to mental illness, and that can increase the chances the patient will seek help, he added.

So far, a number of large enterprises have made FBN available to their employees. Among them are TD Bank Financial Group, ArcelorMittal Dofasco, Healthcare Benefit Trust, Fraser Health Authority in British Columbia, University of British Columbia faculty of medicine, Kingston General Hospital and the Ontario Teachers Insurance Plan.

These groups recognize the serious financial implications that can be caused by untreated mental illness, Ozersky said.

He cites research by Ron Kessler, a mental health economist at Harvard University, who estimates that healthcare costs of mental health disorders in the United States reach $3,000 per employee per year. Add on lost productivity and the costs balloon up to $6,000 per employee per year.

Though the Feeling Better Now system is currently available to about 1 million Canadians, Ozersky hopes to see its scope expand. He'd like the Ontario government to adopt it and he is proposing to test the updated version of Feeling Better Now (FBN2) as part of the British health system's NHS Test Beds Program. ■

Israeli charity crowdfunds for small needs

Hamilton native Naomi Brounstein

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

In the short time since a Hamilton-born Israeli woman co-founded Ten Gav, a crowdfunding charity initiative to help underprivileged Israelis with modest needs, hundreds have signed on to give people a hand up.

Naomi Brounstein, who practised law in Toronto before moving to Ra'anana with her family in 1993, spoke to The CJN about what inspired her to create Ten Gav in 2014 with her co-founder partner, Baltimore-native Vivi Mann.

"We'd both been involved in different types of community work over the years and in volunteer work, and we had been trying to hammer out a concept to meet some of the challenges that we saw," Brounstein said.

"We wanted to develop a platform where you could learn something about a family [in need], read a story about them. We knew that people want to give, but they are hesitant. Is the money really going to where they say it's going?... People don't like it when their funds go toward administrative costs. They want to know that they're giving to something or someone and it's going straight there," she said, adding that Ten Gav fundraises separately to cover administrative costs.

She explained that Ten Gav relies on Israel's social workers to apply on behalf of families in need that have active files with the welfare services.

"We have social workers that we work with across the country. They have clients and they go on home visits and they are exposed to things that we don't see," Brounstein said.

"Maybe an older man is a client and he has diabetes and multiple other problems and [a social worker visits] their home and sees an older woman, his wife, washing clothes over the sink. And they're asked, 'Why are you washing clothes over the sink?' And it turns out the washing machine broke down three months before," said Brounstein, who recently obtained a master's degree in social work from Tel Aviv University.

"These are welfare families. Where are they going to get the money for... a washing machine? They're not."

She said the social worker sends Ten Gav an application, detailing the need and the cost, and if the request meets Ten Gav's standards, a profile about a family's need is posted to its website and a crowdfunding campaign begins. About 80 campaigns have been funded to date.

"We made it a policy that no single item that we post exceeds $1,500 or 5,000 shekels. When you give $100 and the entire item is $1,000, you represent a meaningful portion of that item in the end," she said, adding that donations can be made in Canadian and U.S. dollars, British pounds and Israeli shekels.

"There is quite a variety of cases at any given time. We want to have things that speak to different people. You might want to help Reuben with piano lessons, and someone else might want to help an elderly woman get a new bed, and someone else might want to help a teenager get a computer."

She said one of the more creative requests came from a social worker in Ashdod. She had two families in her jurisdiction who each gave birth to a blind baby within two months of each other.

"There is a centre in Petah Tikvah for parents of newborn babies who are severely visually impaired... It's a program that offers 12 sessions."

The issue was that to get from Ashdod to Petah Tikvah would require the families to take three buses.

"We had this creative social worker who put in a request for a driver to bring these two sets of parents twice a week for six weeks so they could participate in these workshops."

In addition to funding individual campaigns on the website, a way to engage young people in the habit of giving is Ten Gav's Bar or Bat Mitzvah Tzedakah Project.

The idea is for bar and bat mitzvah kids to encourage family and friends to contribute to Ten Gav in honour of the milestone.

"That child has the opportunity to tell their friends and family that they would like gifts to be given in honour of Ten Gav, and at the end of the simchah, it's a great educational experience." ■

Israeli startup eases customer service woes

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Eyal Goldfarb

An Israeli startup designed to help businesses improve customer service, all the while reducing support overhead, engaging more customers online, tracking customer behaviour and boosting sales, is gaining traction world-wide as its Toronto office continues to flourish.

Eyal Goldfarb, 30, who, since 2014, has been the North American director of sales for Nanorep, an Israeli high-tech company that utilizes automatic intelligence to reduce the amount of resources required in answering commonly-asked questions, said what sets this company apart from others is its unique algorithm that helps customers get answers to their questions in an instant.

"Nanorep narrows down the search to typically a singular answer, or maybe two or three, depending on how specific your question is, or what is recorded in the knowledge base [of a website]," Goldfarb explained.

"The knowledge base is the back end of the system, where all the information is stored. Basically Nanorep is meant to narrow down your search, so you don't have to scour the website, you don't have to call an agent, you don't have to send an email. It's instant, it's automated 24/7, and it could even be personalized.

"When you ask a question it might prompt you to log in, and if you log in, the system will recognize who you are. Let's say you're a customer with Rogers and you have to verify who you are, we can have a similar verification process through the widget, where, once we verify you, information can be provided that is relevant to your specific account. It doesn't have to be a generic answer, it could be much more personalized."

He said that unlike their competition, Nanorep's system is able to analyze an entire phrase or question, accounting for spelling mistakes, grammatical errors, synonyms, and different ways of asking the same question, rather than relying on a keyword-based search.

"With our competition, they are keyword-based and once its system recognizes a popular keyword, it will provide every article that contains that keyword, much like a Google search. As a customer who is not interested in doing research, who just wants the answer to a question, they don't want to sift through all that information," he said.

Goldfarb said most customers will check a website first to see if they can find the information independently. Contacting a customer service representative can be a hassle for the customer, and a drain on resources for the business.

Nanorep promises a 40 per cent reduction in contact centre call volume by deflecting low value, repetitive inquiries with its self-learning technology that automatically imports content from the website's FAQ page, customer knowledge bases and other external sources.

"Rather than having to scour the website for the answer to a question, like, 'How much does a certain product cost? Does your company ship to a certain country?' you can ask a direct question and get a direct answer without having to reach a customer service agent over the phone."

Goldfarb, who was born in Israel and moved to Toronto when he was five, explained how he came to lead the Canadian office of a young startup, which is quickly making a name for itself around the world.

"In 2012, I led a Birthright trip and decided to stay in Israel and... scour the job market," he said, adding that he noticed there were many opportunities for fluent English speakers.

"Also, I'm fluent in Hebrew, so that helped, I'm sure, but [Nanorep] was looking for native English speakers to represent their company," he said.

"I had studied business. I worked in sales before, I had done some finance and trading, but I had never been in high tech. I started as a sales rep, and I was selling the product to different companies around the world."

Nanorep, founded in 2007 by four co-founders, three of whom are in their 30s, received financial help from local Israeli investors and by 2009, its product was ready for the market.

After working in Israel for two years, Goldfarb relocated to build the company from Toronto. He said since he started in 2012, the company has doubled in size and has received more investment funding.

Today, Nanorep boasts clients including Ikea in Israel, Vodafone, which is based in the United Kingdom, and Caesar's Palace in Las Vegas.

"Mostly we work with small and medium-sized businesses but we're trying to break in to the large enterprises. That's the direction we're heading in," he said. ■

Canadian MDs to train for possible Israeli disaster

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Dr. Alexander Khemlin

Twenty Canadian doctors will take a crash course in emergency medicine in Israel this fall, with the understanding they may be called upon to return in the event of a major or prolonged natural disaster or conflict.

This is a pilot project organized by Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA), patterned on one launched in France last year. Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's national emergency medical service, is trying to develop an international emergency unit made up of volunteer foreign doctors who are prepared to come to the country and assist on short notice.

Daniel Amzallag, who is co-ordinating the project for CMDA, said that although most people immediately think of war or devastating terrorism when speaking of a national emergency in Israel, MDA is actually focused on preparing the country for a possible earthquake.

Israel lies on a major fault line, the Great Syrian-African Rift, he said. "According to scientists, every 100 years [Israel experiences] strong shaking – 6.0 or higher on the [Richter] scale. The last one was 91 years ago." An earthquake of that magnitude would be enough, it is estimated, to seriously damage 60 to 70 per cent of the infrastructure and potentially cause tens or hundreds of thousands of injuries, he said.

"We want to develop an international unit that is ready and motivated in case they are needed," he said. "They have to know how to use Israeli equipment, ambulances and field hospitals, and be comfortable working with Israeli staff."

About half of the 10 French doctors who had trained in a pilot project for that country last year volunteered during the Gaza conflict in the summer of 2014, Amzallag added.

This past summer, 24 French doctors were enrolled in the intensive training program the Canadian doctors are taking from Nov. 8-12.

Coming from Vancouver, Calgary, Ottawa, Hamilton and the Toronto area, they will fly out as a group from Pearson Airport on Nov. 5 and return Nov. 15, covering their own expenses.

The program, based in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, includes both classroom study and two days of field training on MDA ambulances. On the last day, the Canadians will take part in a mass-casualty drill with MDA workers, as well as police and fire departments.

Dr. Alexander Khemlin, a Russian-born family physician in Richmond Hill, Ont., signed up because it reminds him of the reserve military duty he performed for almost 15 years in Israel as a medical officer in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), after regular service.

It's a way for him to continue to contribute to the country that was his home for 19 years and where he practised medicine, while enhancing skills that can benefit Canada where he has lived since 2010.

Although he participated in all of Israel's military operations from 1996 to 2011, he never had any formal emergency medicine (EM) training. He gained experience in that field during his two-year residency in Goderich, Ont., before assuming his current position at Mackenzie Health hospital in Richmond Hill, Ont. in 2013.

He continues to regularly perform shifts in emergency departments in small communities in Ontario.

One aspect of EM he has never trained in is working on an ambulance.

"After moving to Canada, I missed that experience of going to 'miluim' [reserve duty], doing something to protect the Israeli people, serving the country. When I heard about the CMDA project, I thought that's exactly what I would like to do to keep myself in the loop," he said.

"Despite the fact that my family moved to Canada, we love Israel and continue supporting it." He and wife Mirit have two children aged 16 and 14.

"We strongly believe that every Jew has to find a way to contribute to Israel by serving, volunteering or donating. I believe [I] will set an example to my kids, to do some act to support Israel, when they grow up."

While he prays Israel will never experience such a crisis, Khemlin observes, "All Israeli history and recent changes in the Middle East region indicate that it actually might happen. If such a worst scenario comes true, I will do my best to get ready as soon as possible to fly to Israel."

The pilot project is now at capacity. Khemlin urges other Canadian doctors to consider enrolling in any future training sessions.

"I believe it is the most meaningful way to give back to Israel while we enjoy a life of peace here in Canada." ■

The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus

Leo and Sala Goldhar

By Leo Goldhar

When a friend asked me to speak to a group of teen leaders from NCSY (National Conference of Synagogue Youth) last year I had no idea at all why on earth these young kids would ever be interested in what I had to say. "What would I possibly talk about?" I asked her. "Tell them about the Lebovic Campus and how it came about. It's a story they have to hear!" That actually made no sense to me since I figured it's not the kind of story teenagers would ever want to sit through. However, because I felt I owed it to my friend and respected her opinion, I reluctantly went ahead and spoke to her group of about 50 18-year-olds one evening in Thornhill.

It ended up be an evening I never expected. They were fascinated with the story and the history of the campus and wanted to find out more and more about how it came to be. It was that night that I realized this was a story that needed to be told and it was a story that could help everyone in the community understand that things don't "just happen," and that if we want the kind of Jewish community in which our kids will grow up as confident and proud Jews it takes leadership and action and caring--and not just talking and complaining.

And that's why I eventually decided to put these thoughts on paper and get this story out. I wanted to help inspire the next generation so that they could understand what we can achieve if good people act together and believe in the future. Where would we be today as a community if previous generations hadn't taken the risks and had the vision to build the institutions that have made the Toronto Jewish community as vibrant as it is today?

Where would we have been without the original Brunswick YMHA, or the Spadina "Y" (now the beautiful Nadal JCC) , or Mt. Sinai Hospital, or Baycrest, or the North "Y" -now being rebuilt as the Prosserman JCC on Sherman Campus? For me, personally, my roots in this community go back to when I first played handball at the Spadina Y just as it opened in the early 50's. I had come to realize that 60 years later a new generation needed that kind of place as well.

Hearing those questions from those NCSY kids that night and seeing their enthusiasm, I realized our future was in good hands and I felt so proud to have helped build a Jewish future for them.

When Ted Sokolsky first pulled me into the Vaughan Campus project I had no idea what I was getting into. Like I said before, I was new to this "community stuff" yet before I knew it, I was involved in design, financing, fundraising and managing - things I never thought I'd be working on as a volunteer. It wasn't always easy and it often became frustrating but I stuck with it because I believed in Ted's vision and his goal of inspiring the next generation to join in the responsibility of building this community. Ted believed we had one last opportunity for the older generation south of Steeles to pass on a legacy of community building and do what generations had done before--build for the future. I am in awe of the fact that so many members of our community took the risks and made the investment to build a place their own kids might never use. They believed in community so much that they helped raise the funds for the $185 million project.

Sure there were plenty of disappointments along the way. I was disappointed that members of the community north of Steeles didn't step forward financially to the extent I thought they should. Let's hope the investment we have made in their children by strengthening the new community up north will turn that around in the future. I was disappointed that more donors did not step up to the plate. The few that give (the Good Guys) are pioneers and heroes. The many who have the means but hide behind the others have always been a mystery to me. Too many families fight about money instead of enjoying the nachas sharing it with community can bring.

I was also disappointed that many of our community institutions didn't want to take the risks and join us on Lebovic. Many organizations, synagogues and schools weren't willing to make the investment in the growing community in Vaughan despite the fact that's where so many young families were headed. In my opinion, they did the community a disservice and may pay the consequences in dwindling memberships and involvement.

Ironically, the reluctance of other organizations to join the campus turned out to be a bit of a blessing in disguise. Federation had originally offered land-leases to other community groups based on a cost of just $600,000 an acre. Yet it became clear that after Reena and Bialik Hebrew Day School, there would be no more takers. Fortunately, Federation was eventually able to sell that surplus land for upwards of several millions of dollars an acre. (We also made the right decision to build underground parking--that saved us so much land!) The economic recession may have slowed our fundraising but the real estate boom had brought us a well-needed dividend for which the community benefited tremendously.

Yes there were disappointments but there were tremendous ups as well. I was thrilled that the Royal Bank of Canada believed in us and came up with the original loan to help close the deal on the land. I was overwhelmed by the incredible support we got from the City of Vaughan and four different mayors who helped make it possible--Lorna

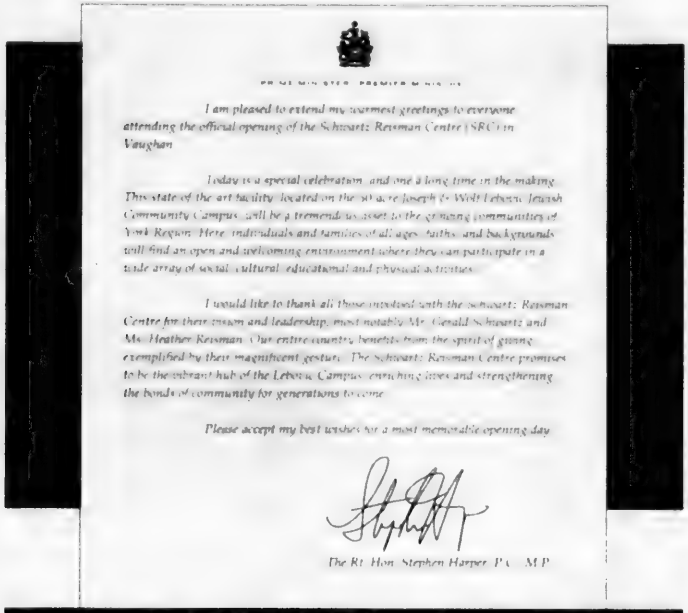
At the opening of the Lev & Sala Goldhar Conference & Celebration Centre



I am pleased to extend my warmest greetings to everyone attending the official opening of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre (SRC) in Vaughan.

Today is a special celebration, and one a long time in the making. This state-of-the-art facility, located on the 50-acre Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, will be a tremendous asset to the growing community of York Region. Here, individuals and families of all ages, faiths, and backgrounds will find an open and welcoming environment where they can participate in a wide array of social, cultural, educational and physical activities.

I would like to thank all those involved with the Schwartz/Reisman Centre for their vision and leadership, most notably Mr. Gerald Schwartz and Ms. Heather Reisman. Our entire country benefits from the spirit of giving exemplified by their magnificent gesture. The Schwartz/Reisman Centre promises to be the vibrant hub of the Lebovic Campus, enriching lives and strengthening the bonds of community for generations to come.

Please accept my best wishes for a most memorable opening day.

The Rt. Hon. Stephen Harper, P.C., M.P.

A letter from Prime Minister Stephen Harper on the official opening of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre

Jackson, Michael Di Biase, Linda Jackson and the excellent current Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua. All four of those mayors were integral to the success of the project.

I remember, in fact, taking a copy of a wonderful book to Mayor Lorna Jackson written by Jaclyn Shulman and Bonnie Goldstein called "Voices from the Heart." The book was written in honour of the 50th Anniversary of Israel and highlighted the Toronto Jewish community's involvement in the Jewish state. I was hoping to introduce the Vaughan Campus Project and I wanted her to understand how deep our commitment to building community was. After that meeting we never looked back. The City of Vaughan guided us through the municipal planning process, negotiated on our behalf with the local developers and helped create the beautiful park south of the Campus that is so important to TanenbaumCHAT and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre. They were true partners right front the beginning.

In telling this story I wanted to personally thank so many people who helped make this dream come true. I know I will be leaving many names out--so many deserve to be thanked--but I want to mention a special few who made the Campus come to life and were incredible colleagues. I can't overstate what our master architect Guela Solow Ruda brought to the project. Her passion and brilliance guided us from day one. Our fabulous construction committee headed up by Sheldon Goodman, Lou Greenbaum and Michael Naiberg provided the best professional guidance anyone could have asked for. They did the heavy lifting behind the scenes and the results sure show.

The Lebovic Campus was an enormous task, the scope of which the community had never taken on before. It was more than bricks and mortar, it was ideas and ingenuity and guts. Paul Morton and Michael Levy were critical in developing our strategy of outsourcing the building management and physical fitness functions of the JCC. In fact, Michael Levy brought his personal entrepreneurship to our cause and not only created the business model and design used on Lebovic but helped bring them to Nadal and Prosserman as well. Thanks also to David Goldstein who was working with us from day one on so much of our strategy. My campus management co-chair Ariella Rohringer was also terrific in bringing business acumen to the running of all three of our campuses. And the late great Gordy Wolfe z'l helped create a staff model to incorporate these business strategies within a communal framework and that model still stands today.

Few people know that we had many opportunities to purchase land off Bathurst Street, some as a far west as Dufferin. I stuck to my guns and insisted we would only buy property with Bathurst Street frontage. And the reason I did that kind of sums up the entire purpose for building the Vaughan Campus and why I'm writing this story.

We weren't just building a JCC or a school or a banquet hall. We were building a new community. There had been lots of attempts to develop new Jewish communities along Leslie Street and Bayview in Richmond Hill but those attempts petered out. Whether we like or not, our community clings to Bathurst Street and I knew young families who had made the decision to move north would love to be linked to Bathurst Street as well. It's the spine that links our community together - north to south - and it's unique in North America.

Take that long drive along Bathurst Street yourself. See the shuls and schools and stores and UJA lawn signs and feel the breadth and depth of what we have here in Toronto that is so special. Bathurst Street, with all its traffic and ugly strip plazas is still a thing of beauty. It's a symbol of belonging and caring and now the Lebovic Campus joins that tumultuous family as well.

And that's what it's all about: building for our collective Jewish family and our own families as well. That crazy Bathurst Street membership card is more important than you can imagine. It can frustrate you at times, but in the end it's a symbol of our shared past, present and our amazing future together.

To everyone reading this chapter, I hope you have the opportunity to help write the next chapter and the dozens that must follow. Things don't just happen--we make them happen together and one day soon I hope you too will have a great story to write.

And finally to my beautiful wife Sala and my amazing children--thank you for your understanding and support all these years. I hope you are as proud of the work I have done for community as I am of you guys. I think my assignment is finally done and I have to say, it's been a privilege.

GAVIN RABINOWITZ
JTA, LESBOS, GREECE

As the small rubber dinghy crowded with Syrians and Afghans emerged from the midnight-black sea to land on a desolate pebble beach, the first people to greet the bewildered and frightened refugees were two Israelis.

"Does anyone need a doctor?" Majeda Kardosh, 27, a nurse from Nazareth, shouted repeatedly in Arabic as the asylum seekers scrambled ashore amid cries of celebration and tears of relief at having survived the short but perilous crossing from Turkey to this Greek island.

Her team partner, Tali Shaltiel, 31, a physician from Jerusalem, stood knee deep in the water, helping a shivering four-year-old girl out of her wet clothes and a pair of inflatable armbands that would have provided little protection had the overloaded boat capsized at sea.

Kardosh and Shaltiel are part of a small advance group of volunteers from IsraAid, an Israeli non-governmental organization that is trying to provide some assistance to the hundreds of thousands of refugees and migrants who are flowing into Europe.

While IsraAid has plenty of experience in disaster relief and assistance in 31 countries – from the 2011 earthquake and tsunami in Japan to the Ebola outbreak in West Africa – this mission presents a unique challenge: the beneficiaries come from countries that are traditionally hostile, or even officially still at war, with Israel.

But for Shaltiel, that's unimportant.

"You are meeting fellow human beings," she said. "You see agony and pain, you see a need, then what does it matter where the person is from.

"In the end, you hope that the human contact will bring us forward," she added.

But Shaltiel, who also volunteered for the IsraAid mission in South Sudan, does acknowledge that for the Syrians, Iraqis, Afghans and Pakistanis – who make up the vast majority of those arriving – having Israelis as a first contact in Europe can be unexpected and unnerving.

"We try to find a balance," Shaltiel said. "On the one hand, we are wearing IsraAid shirts and speaking most of the time in Hebrew to each other. But, ultimately, you just want people to get help, you don't want to put up barriers to that."

Plus, in reality, even though the Israelis are wearing bright blue Stars of David on their shirts, most of the refugees don't even notice amid the chaos and tumult of emotions of the landing beaches, said Kardosh, who does most of the communicating with them in Arabic.

> You see pain and agony...what does it matter where that person is from.
> Tali Shaltiel, IsraAid volunteer

Among those who recognize the T-shirts, most have a positive response – although some are resistant. One man who was receiving treatment from Shaltiel kept asking Kardosh, "Tell me the truth, is she a Jew?"

"I tried to ignore him, but he persisted. Eventually I said to him, 'She is here to help you, what does it matter who she is?'" Kardosh said. "After about 10 minutes he came back and offered Tali a biscuit and apologized."

Another issue for IsraAid has been finding Arabic-speaking personnel who can communicate with the refugees. That's particularly important for the second part of IsraAid's mission, which is to provide psychological first-aid to those who have experienced trauma.

One IsraAid volunteer social worker spent Saturday providing support to the family of a five-year-old girl who drowned on the crossing. Another team was on the island of Rhodes assisting survivors from a boat that sank, killing 34, including 15 infants and children.

"We are working in complicated conditions and our Arabic speakers have that experience of working in difficult situations," said Naama Gorodischer, IsraAid's global programs manager.

Still, it's a challenge for those who have never done field work before.

"Usually I'm dressed in heels and a skirt with my regular shift and going to the gym four times a week," said Kardosh, who is also a lecturer at the Schoenbrunn Nursing School at Tel Aviv University.

"Now I'm here," she said, pointing at the beach strewn with deflated dinghies, hundreds of life jackets, lost shoes and trash – the debris of thousands of journeys.

At the moment, the main aim of the team is to assess the needs of the refugees and find gaps in the services provided by the overwhelmed Greek authorities and other volunteer groups.

IsraAid plans to expand the medical teams and eventually establish a mobile clinic that will provide emergency care for new arrivals on the beaches. It will also expand the psycho-social help to bases in the registration and refugee camps that have been set up.

The NGO also has volunteers providing assistance on the Croatia-Hungary border. Eventually IsraAid plans to be in final-destination countries like Germany, where they hope to help with refugee rehabilitation.

"The aim is to have a presence as an organization along the entire journey," Gorodischer said.

On the beach in Lesbos, the work goes beyond the medical. When she is finished dealing with the hypothermia, dehydration, wounds and illnesses of the travellers, Shaltiel gathers some of the refugees to explain their situation to them.

Most have only a vague idea of which country they are in, or that they are on an island and not the mainland. None realize that their landing spot is still a gruelling 40-mile walk from the registration camps.

"It's safer to stay here during the night and start your walk in the morning," she tells them, giving them a map made by the IsraAid team with instructions written in Arabic.

The volunteers look to assist in any way they can.

"The situation is chaotic, you don't always know what you need in the beginning, so we keep looking for ways to help, to see what's needed," said Boaz Arad, a volunteer who was documenting IsraAid activities and also organizing the logistics and transportation.

After finding hundreds of people sleeping in the open along the road, IsraAid volunteers bought sleeping bags to distribute to families with children. They were also waiting for a shipment of donated baby carriers from Israel.

The American Jewish Committee said it was increasing funding to IsraAid, which is also supported by other American Jewish groups and the Israeli government.

"During this holiest period of the Jewish year, we are proud to assist... in offering vital help to Syrians who fled the horrific war in their homeland and seek a new start," AJC executive director David Harris said.

For Shaltiel, the sight of tens of thousands of refugees walking across Europe was especially poignant.

"When we say 'never again,' it is also an obligation to do something," she said. "Apparently I can't stop the war in Syria, but I can do something." ■

Tensions flare dangerously in east Jerusalem

Yair Lootsteen

Armon HaNatziv, or East Talpiot as it is officially known, is a Jewish neighbourhood in south Jerusalem. It was built, beginning in the 1970s, adjacent to an impressive complex overlooking the Old City, which has housed the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization's headquarters in the city since 1948. Previously, it served as the official residence of the British High Commissioner, hence the name Armon HaNatziv – the Governor's Palace.

The neighbourhood, now housing more than 15,000 residents, is beyond the Green Line, but within Jerusalem's extended municipal boundaries, as drawn after the Six Day War. It borders several Arab neighbourhoods, formerly West Bank villages now part of Jerusalem.

I know many people living in Armon HaNatziv. On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, friends hosted out-of-town guests for the festive meal. Late that night, as the guests made their way out of the area, rocks thrown in their direction narrowly missed their car as they drove on a road flanked by Tzur Bachar, an Arab neighbourhood.

Alexander Levlovitz and his two daughters were less fortunate. Later that night, as they drove home toward Armon HaNatziv on the same road, their car was hit by rocks thrown from the hillside below Tzur Bachar. Alexander lost control of his vehicle, causing it to overturn. He was killed and both his daughters were injured. Police called Levlovitz's death an act of terrorism. Residents of Tzur Bachar were adamant it was an unfortunate traffic accident.

Violence – unacceptable violence – is spiralling in the Holy City. It's not yet out of control, but east Jerusalem and its residents, which mostly stayed out of the fray during the first and second intifadahs have become much more bellicose lately.

Not limited to the southern environs of the city, hostile acts are now commonplace in many parts of east Jerusalem. Stones and Molotov cocktails are regular fare, while knife attacks, shootings and random use of vehicles to plough into innocent pedestrians are rarer.

Those most affected are members of the security forces and residents of neighbourhoods on the seam between the east and west Jerusalem. Recent news reports are crammed with interviews with Armon HaNatziv residents living directly on that seam, describing from their balconies how their formerly idyllic views of neighbouring Arab villages have been replaced with images of scorched outer walls of their homes, having been targeted by gasoline-filled incendiary devices, and of piles of rocks and other projectiles recently thrown into their yards.

I haven't heard a convincing argument about the specific catalyst for all of this. Some say it is dates back to last summer's horrific murder of Mohammed Abu Khdeir, an innocent teenager burned alive by Jewish terrorists after being randomly kidnapped outside his home in northern Jerusalem. Supposedly, this was in revenge for three Israeli teens who were kidnapped and murdered by Palestinian terrorists.

Other commentators and government spokespeople assert the violence stems from Muslim incitement falsely accusing Israel of planning changes to the status quo on the Temple Mount, thus allegedly endangering Al-Aqsa, Islam's third-most-holy site.

Our government's response was to start building tall fences around Jewish homes directly on the seam and to "liberalize" police rules of engagement, allowing sharpshooters to fire live rounds at stone-throwers, and to threaten judges' promotions if Palestinian perpetrators aren't punished more harshly. Thankfully, the attorney general nixed the latter two initiatives.

Instead of fences and threats, Israelis, and even more so Palestinians, need some semblance of hope, some light at the end of the tunnel. There hasn't been any for years now, with leaders of both sides unable or unwilling to renew dialogue in good faith.

My friends in Armon HaNatziv have no plans to leave. Nor do the 300,000 Palestinians who live in Jerusalem.

As we celebrated our High Holidays and Muslims their Eid el Adha, let's pray that calmer heads prevail and that we somehow put our heads together. The alternatives aren't pretty. ■

Much-hailed 'world Jewry' project yet to get off the ground

BEN SALES
JTA TEL AVIV

With a budget reaching US$300 million, it was conceived as a broad partnership between the Israeli government and leading Diaspora Jewish groups. Its goal: to create a stronger connection between global Jews and Israel.

But nearly two years after its launch was announced with much fanfare – and after a string of delays – the Joint Initiative of the Government of Israel and World Jewry has yet to get off the ground. Even as an Israeli government ministry moves forward with appointing its staff, two of the three bodies that once led the project are now distancing themselves from it, and funding remains uncertain.

"There's been a lot of politics surrounding this initiative," said Jay Ruderman, whose Ruderman Family Foundation focuses on strengthening Israel-Diaspora ties. "This initiative is talking about being around for the long term. The important question to ask is, who's in charge? Who's making the decisions? How open are they to learning about the Diaspora and treating them as equals?"

Inaugurated in November 2013, the initiative was conceived to fund Israel education and Jewish identity-building programs in Diaspora communities – in camps, schools and on campus – and finance young Diaspora Jews coming on short- and long-term trips to Israel. The project hopes to replicate the success of Birthright Israel, the free 10-day trips to Israel that have drawn more than 500,000 participants, by building platforms for similar trips and programs that will make Diaspora youth feel closer to Israel.

But what has happened instead is a series of delays, caused in part by a war and last year's election campaign, and further exacerbated by vague promises and a lack of concrete funding. When the project was approved in June 2014, Jewish Agency for Israel Chairman Natan Sharansky predicted program proposals would begin to be issued within a month, but they have yet to materialize. Funders from the Diaspora, meant to provide a majority of the budget, have not yet committed to donating.

Israel's cabinet approved the project last year as a tripartite partnership: Israel's Prime Minister's Office would direct the initiative in concert with the Jewish Agency, which would represent major Diaspora organizations, and the Diaspora Ministry would manage the day-to-day operations.

The cabinet voted to invest $50 million in the initiative by 2017 and a total of $100 million by 2022. The government wanted Diaspora sources – federations, philanthropic foundations and individual donors – to contribute double those sums for two-thirds of the initiative's $300 million total budget.

But the initiative has yet to launch. A subsequent cabinet decision in June, weeks after Israel's new governing coalition formed, put the Diaspora Ministry in charge of the initiative's policy and its operations – effectively removing the Prime Minister's Office. In early August, the Jewish Agency quit the project, complaining in a letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that it had been frozen out of the decision making process.

"Until the program is returned to its original conception and direction, we no longer see this as the joint initiative between the Government of Israel and World Jewry and therefore can no longer see ourselves part of it," Sharansky and his agency's board chairman, Charles Ratner, wrote in the Aug. 6 letter. "This undertaking has transformed simply into a funding framework for programs to be conducted by a single government ministry."

The Diaspora Ministry says it has remained faithful to the initiative's original goals and that it will begin funding programs across the Jewish world by early 2016. But a Diaspora Ministry official told JTA that the ministry will have exclusive final say over which programs are approved.

The ministry official said the funding will be allocated across the Jewish ideological spectrum. A steering committee appointed by the ministry includes a former Sheldon Adelson deputy, a Detroit federation executive, a Holocaust education activist and an Israeli philanthropist. The Jewish Agency has also been offered a seat on the committee.

Ambitious Diaspora-Israel project appears to have stalled

"The professional staff will work together with federations and philanthropies," the official said. "The initiative doesn't look at denominations or political affiliations. It looks at platforms."

However, the ministry official could not name any confirmed funders who have committed to matching the government's budget for the project. And the umbrella Jewish communal organization in the United States, the Jewish Federations of North America, (JFNA) supports the Jewish Agency's protest of the initiative.

"We are proud of the Jewish Agency's ongoing effort to meet the needs of the Jewish people, and we support their strategy as they move forward with the Government of Israel's initiative," JFNA president Jerry Silverman said in a statement to JTA.

It isn't even clear whether the Diaspora Ministry has Netanyahu's support; a spokesman for the prime minister would not comment on the issue. And Netanyahu sent a letter to Sharansky and Ratner, the Jewish Agency chairs, weeks after their split with the Diaspora Ministry suggesting that he would like to continue working with them toward the initiative's goals.

> The initiative doesn't look at denominations or political affiliations

"The Jewish Agency is our historic and invaluable partner to this end" of strengthening Israel-Diaspora ties, Netanyahu wrote on Aug. 17. He added that he hopes to "expand our co-operation even further."

Despite the conflicts and unknowns, the Diaspora Ministry is optimistic that the initiative will move forward. The ministry is hiring a professional staff to oversee it, housed in a government-funded nonprofit that manages the project. The official said the nonprofit would launch pilot programs within the next several months.

"There are a number of foundations and philanthropies who have already been in talks with the ministry," the official said. "It's good to be ambitious." ■

Jordanan's King Abdullah refuses to talk to Benjamin Netanyahu

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

Jordan's King Abdullah II is refusing to meet with, or even speak to, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu regarding the current upsurge in tension relating to the Temple Mount, Arab sources told The Times of Israel.

According to the sources, American diplomats have been urging the king to help calm tensions via direct communication with Netanyahu. But the king has thus far not been prepared to host or even speak by phone with the prime minister, the sources said, because he believes Netanyahu would portray such interaction as proof of "business as usual" in Israeli-Jordanian ties.

Israel's Prime Minister's Office had no immediate comment.

Abdullah warned that bilateral ties would be affected by any further Israeli provocations at the site. Israeli officials then responded anonymously that Jordan was partly to blame for recent violence, since the Jordanian-appointed Waqf, which administers the Temple Mount's Muslim holy sites, has allowed Palestinian youths to stockpile weapons.

The Rai Al-Youm newspaper, edited by the anti-Israeli journalist Abdel Bari Atwan, reported on Sept. 24 that Abdullah has rebuffed several efforts by Netanyahu to speak with him. The newspaper said that Jordan has changed its response to upsurges in tension: while it has not hurried to recall its ambassador from Tel Aviv, the king, however, is not talking to Netanyahu.

In previous rounds of tension, contacts between Netanyahu and the king yielded promises by Israel to avoid provocations, such as visits by politicians to the Temple Mount. On Sept. 20, however, Agriculture Minister Uri Arie, visited the site.

Bilateral tensions notwithstanding, security relations between Israel and Jordan are being maintained for now. Jordan is understood to be providing Israel with intelligence assistance in various fields, including regarding the presence of Islamic State-affiliated groups close to the border with Syria. ■

Shabbat dispute slows down Tel Aviv to Jerusalem high-speed train

JTA
JERUSALEM

The completion of a fast train connection between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem will be delayed by two years because of the Israeli Economy Ministry's refusal to allow work on Shabbat, Israel Railway said.

The statement on Sept.25 said the project, which is due to be completed in 2017, may take until 2019, Army Radio reported. Israel Railways, which, like most public transportation bodies in Israel does not provide services to the public on Shabbat, also said it would cancel departures immediately before and after Shabbat in favour of work on the fast connection during week days.

The cancellations, which are believed to affect at least 30,000 passengers, follow a dispute involving the train company, the Ministry of Economy under Aryeh Deri of the haredi Shas party and the Ministry of Transportation under Israel Katz of Likud.

Katz said Deri's ministry was blocking work on Shabbat, but Deri's office told Army Radio that "if Israel Railways wants to allow work on Shabbat, it needs to attach the Transportation Ministry's approval and will be granted permission."

Israel Railway's current connection between the cities, situated 75 kilometres apart, has a travel time of 81 minutes.

Public transportation on Shabbat is a divisive issue in Israel, where advocates of the ban say allowing public transportation would violate the status quo – a series of agreements reached in the 1950s between the Labor-led government and haredi leaders, which attempted to regulate issues of religion and state.

Many haredi and religious Jewish Israelis oppose transportation on Shabbat because they perceive it as a violation of the fifth commandment, one of Judaism's 10 basic laws.

But many non-religious Israelis perceive the ban as an unreasonable instance of religious coercion, and withholding of what they regard as a basic service by the state. Avigdor Lieberman, head of the right-ist-secularist Yisrael Beitenu party and a former transportation minister, told Army Radio the incident involving Israel Railways "shows the government allowed the public to be held hostage by haredi parties." ■

Andrew Rosen, below, and a scene from Portal to Hell!!!!, starring the late "Rowdy" Roddy Piper, which screened at TIFF.

Aircraft Pictures soars to new heights

AMY SKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Andrew Rosen has a lot on his plate. As the co-owner of a Toronto media production company, he and his business partner Anthony Leo currently have multiple projects on the go, including one with heavyweight executive producer Angelina Jolie.

Rosen and Leo started Aircraft Pictures 10 years ago and have continuously developed and produced scripted television shows and movies across traditional and digital platforms.

"We just say now we're creating content for the screen, it doesn't matter what screen you're really watching it on," he says, knowing audiences find content in a variety of ways. Yet, he doesn't want to simply churn out products. Rather, he strives to take on projects that he'd like to watch, and that he'd want to show his kids.

Their first animated feature film The Breadwinner, based on the eponymous book by Canadian author Deborah Ellis, is starting production. It tells the story of a young Afghan girl living under Taliban rule. And it's also the one with Jolie at the helm.

As an international co-production between Canada, Ireland and Luxembourg, the Academy Award-nominated Irish company Cartoon Saloon is creating all of the animations.

Back in the GTA, they're working on a TV series for Family Channel called The Wonderful Wayneys. It stars Jason Priestly and Molly Ringwald as the parents of a brood of multi-exceptional children. Although, their youngest kid is a bit of a black sheep; he's the mischievous one in a family of high-achievers. Rosen, who's a father of two, says this comedy will premiere in the spring of 2016.

Recently, Aircraft's horror comedy Portal To Hell!!!, by director Vivieno Caldinelli and writer Matt Watts, screened at the 40th annual Toronto International Film Festival as part of the Short Cuts series. This marked Rosen's third time at TIFF. He hopes to use the festival as a platform to develop Portal into a feature film.

Along with these more traditional platforms, Rosen and Leo are working with YouTube stars, such as the Epic Mealtime crew and Filipino Canadian Mikey Bustos, to develop potential TV series for the CBC's and the Canadian Film Centre's Screens Comedy Workshop.

Despite Rosen's impressive roster, he wasn't always focused on the film industry. He graduated from Montreal's McGill University with a bachelor of science in anatomy, but around the same time, he started volunteering at the Canadian Film Centre.

Without much formal training in film production, Rosen says his experience working at Jewish summer camps helps him on set. "A lot of the skills I learned at camp are very transferable to producing."

He moved through Canadian Young Judea camps, eventually becoming the program director at Biluim. "One thing I always bring up on set is the same thing we learned at camp," he says describing the concept of leadership by example. Rather than just staying in the office, he and Leo endeavour to get their hands dirty, working closely with their writers and their crew.

"There's only two of us," says Rosen of his production house. "And we just have to love what we work on. We just look for things that intrigue us because we know we're going to be living with it for a long time." ■

Bratislava excursion is not a disappointment

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, BRATISLAVA

The capital of Slovakia may best be described as tired. Whereas Prague in the Czech Republic – stitched together with Slovakia for 74 years, save for the Nazi period – is Bohemian hip, Bratislava looks Soviet-era grim, with blocky grey buildings and no shortage of graffiti.

Bratislava was included on our recent "Romantic Danube Jewish Heritage Tour" boat cruise, and some passengers were told by the cruise director that the city could be skipped. Apparently, there's not much Jewish to see here, so the on-board gossip went.

Those who took the excursion anyway were not disappointed.

There are two major sites to see, and one is memorable.

The first is the Slovak Holocaust Memorial, located in the centre of Bratislava's Old Town, on the site of the former Rybné Square synagogue, demolished in 1967.

"It survived World War II but not communism," says our plainly anti-communist guide.

Erected in 1996 by the federal government to commemorate the country's roughly 75,000 Holocaust victims, it consists of two facing black walls with the silhouette of the destroyed synagogue, and is topped by a Star of David serving as a kind of shield. The word "remember" is etched into the granite base in Slovak and Hebrew.

I waited for our guide to remember Slovakia's role in the Holocaust. She didn't.

Slovakia seceded from what was then called Czechoslovakia in March 1939 and became a Nazi puppet under the leadership of the arch-fascist and anti-Semitic Josef Tiso, a Catholic priest. The country was the first Axis partner to consent to the deportation of its 90,000 Jews.

Between March and October 1942, Slovak gendarmes, military personnel and members of the feared Hlinka Guard rounded up some 58,000 Jews, put them in labour and concentration camps, and then turned them over to German authorities, who transported them to Auschwitz and other death mills.

That's important because it puts Slovakia in the odious company of those countries in which Jews were handed over to the Nazis from areas without any German occupation.

That was the situation until 1944, when the Nazis marched in to quell an uprising against Tiso. A further 13,000 Jews were then deported. But the majority of Slovak Jews were hunted down by fellow Slovaks.

It's nothing to be proud of, but on our tour, it's not mentioned.

Now home to about 800 Jews, Bratislava was once a great Jewish centre. The tour's highlight confirms that.

The sign outside the Chatam Sofer Memorial reminds the visitor that it is a sacred space. The entrance, a door inside a grey box at the end of a long ramp, is innocuous enough. But down a flight of stairs, in a well-lit mausoleum, one finds 23 graves, including that of Bratislava's most famous rabbi, Moses Schreiber, who died in 1839. A towering figure in his day, he was known as the Chatam Sofer, the Seal of the Scribe.

This not a museum, we are told, but a hallowed graveyard – the sole remaining part of a centuries-old Jewish cemetery that was destroyed in 1943 when a raised roadway and tunnel were constructed. Fearing a curse if the rabbis' graves were demolished, pro-Nazi authorities (perhaps bribed) permitted only the most important section, the resting places of the prominent rabbis and scholars, to be preserved as an entombed shrine. Today, it attracts many Jewish pilgrims.

You may feel some spooky rumbling. There's a tram stop just above. ■

Israeli app set to take Canadian universities by storm

DANIEL KOREN
dkoren@thecjn.ca

It's the start of October, and that means university campuses have been buzzing with the sound of students running from lecture halls to libraries to frat parties, before stumbling back to their dorm rooms in the middle of the night. But in the midst of all that hustle and bustle, these young academic minds also require sustenance. And quickly.

That's why across some 125 university campuses in the United States there's a new app on campus that's proven to be quite popular, one that's determined to save students time they could otherwise be using to study, socialize, or sleep: Tapingo.

The app is also slated to roll into Canada in January.

Tapingo is a free app that allows students to order food from their favourite places via their smartphones, so that when they arrive they can just pick it up from the counter without having to wait in line. The app eventually learns your preferences, so if you've ordered a non-fat, skim milk cappucino with extra foam and a dash of nutmeg from Starbucks two days in a row, it will remember your order and ask if you want it again the next day - which you likely will.

Payment is done via your phone so the transaction is seamless, smooth and effective, giving university students on the go that extra few minutes to relax before their tumultuous day begins. Daniel Almog, CEO of the Tel Aviv/San Francisco-based startup, explains that he and chief technology officer Udi Oster first came up with the idea in the most unlikeliest of places: while serving in the IDF's intelligence unit.

"It seemed odd to us that technology had improved so many aspects of daily life, yet the impact of these technological advances were so minimal when it came to buying - something we do every day," Almog explains to The CJN. "We knew there was massive potential to improve the buying experience, and that our success hinged on overcoming the obstacles faced by other players in this space."

After the app launched in Israel, Almog quickly saw there was a huge market available on American university campuses, which he refers to as a "densely populated closed ecosystem."

The company is planning to launch in Canadian universities starting with the University of Ottawa in January.

Time-saving app will soon be launched in Canada

Students line up outside their university Starbucks.

"Our expansion into Canada is very exciting - and we're hosting a poutine night to celebrate," Almog says.

The company is currently in touch with other large universities in Canada. While the app will look similar from the consumer perspective, expanding into a new country gives Tapingo the opportunity to enhance their software capabilities to accommodate different currencies. "Et maintenant, nous parlons en français! Not really, but we did make the app available in Canadian French, as well as English," Almog says.

"Students are active, tech-savvy users whose needs are evolving," he says. "Tapingo's technology suits most obviously the lifestyle and demands of the college market, but increased convenience is desirable across all generations. We expect to see our technology adopted in other industries."

For the 2015/16 academic season, Tapingo launched several new features to ensure efficiency. First is Tapingo Delivers, an on-demand delivery service that will be staffed entirely by college students. Because deliveries will be primarily done on campus, Almog believes that students will be able to deliver three to four orders per hour. Like Uber, student-couriers can log in whenever they have free time and start making deliveries. "This empowers us to introduce entrepreneurship to students, who otherwise might not have exposure to this world, and helps us provide a superior service," Almog explains.

Other features the startup is rolling out include scheduled ordering - allowing you to schedule your lunch and coffee breaks around your classes - and quick picks, so that businesses aligned with Tapingo can note which items they carry are always immediately available. It's also launching Club Tapingo, which will create a community of Tapingo users and provide access to exclusive discounts and events.

> Tapingo's technology suits most obviously the lifestyle and demands of the college market

Last year, Tapingo's presence exploded on the university scene, seeing an average of 25,000 transactions a day. The company also received US$22 million in venture-capital funding. Naturally, many students went to social media platforms like Twitter to hail the app for making their lives easier, and providing them with more time for productivity. Understandably, the company received particular praise once they partnered with Starbucks. At the start of September, they partnered with another reputable brand, available for both pickup and delivery: Chipotle.

"Our users look to us to offer everything from local favourites to large national brands," Almog explains. "Which is what differentiates us from competitors."

Like a myriad of other successful startups, Almog explains why Israel has earned its reputation as the Startup Nation. "There is an active and prospering tech scene in Israel," he says. "The combination of a strong entrepreneurial spirit and talented engineering community is a recipe for success." ■

ProAm raises money for Israel Tennis Centers

plungen@thecjn.ca

Consider the following three names: Andy Ram, Jonathan Erlich and Harel Levy. What do they share in common?

If you answered they're all world class tennis players who competed for Israel, you're half right. For a more complete answer and full points in this CJN mini- quiz, you'd also have to answer that all three developed their skills, in part, at the Israel Tennis Centers (ITC) – Ram in Jerusalem, Erlich in Haifa and Levy in Ramat Hasharon.

For bonus points, you'd have to know that all three were in Toronto last year for a ProAm in support of the Israeli charity. This year's event, the 12th Invitational ProAm in support of Israel Tennis Centers, will feature the return of Ram and Levy. This time they'll be joined by Dean Goldfine, a highly regarded coach from Florida who has instructed former ATP Tour player Aaron Krickstein and Grand Slam champion Andy Roddick, and who was one of the coaches of the American team at the 2004 Olympics.

They'll be joined by a number of other local professionals and 32 amateurs who have ponied up a registration fee of $1,000 and raised another $800 in support of the ITC Foundation.

The event will take place on Sept. 19-20 at York Racquets Club and is in honour of the late Harold Green, a longtime supporter of Israel Tennis Centers and who, along with other Canadian supporters, raised the funds to build Canada Stadium, where Israel hosted Davis Cup and Fed Cup events.

The ProAm is an important day on the ITC fundraising calendar, said Toby Rosner, executive director of the ITC Foundation in Canada.

The amount raised varies from year to year but organizers expect to gross as much as $250,000 this year, she said. Add the money raised at this year's annual golf tournament (the numbers aren't in yet, but last year's total grossed $750,000), plus the sums expected to be raised at this year's JNF Negev Dinner, and 2015 is shaping up to be a big year for ITC in Canada, Rosner said.

The 2015 JNF dinner on Nov. 22 will honour Kevin Green and Joseph Frieberg "for their exemplary leadership in the Toronto Jewish community and for their lifelong support of the State of Israel."

Proceeds from the Negev campaign will be directed towards The Green/Frieberg Social Services Complex at the Samson ITC in Be'er Sheva.

Green and Frieberg are former international chairs of the ITC, an Israeli institution that is getting more and more recognition for the important work it does in promoting sport, helping youth at risk, fostering Arab-Jewish co-existence and empowering young women, said Rosner.

"It's not just about tennis," she continued. "It's about life. It's about creating champions in life. That's the goal. It's beyond tennis."

The ITC was founded in 1976 and is today considered one of the largest social service organizations for children in Israel. More than 20,000 Israeli youngsters participate in ITC programs every year at the ITC's 14 centres across the country.

Earlier this summer, ITC-trained Rotem Ashkenazi, 17, won the inaugural 2015 World Deaf Tennis Championships in Nottingham, England. The tournament featured deaf athletes from 20 countries.

Ashkenazi joined the ITC at age 12, training at the centre's high performance location in Ramat Hasharon. She is the only female deaf competitive tennis player in Israel and is a member of the ITC national girls team. ■

Oil boom and bust, Galician style

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Peak Oil. Neil Young's condemnation of the environmental damage caused by the Alberta "Tar Sands." The Leap Manifesto on climate and energy policy. All this seems notably of our moment. But the challenges raised – the impact of petroleum discoveries on the economy, daily life and the environment – have an important mid-19th century Polish precedent.

It was in south-eastern Poland, not far from the Hungarian and Russian borders, that important discoveries associated with wax, petroleum, and distillation methods turned a semi-feudal, mostly rural landscape into one of the first oil economies of the modern era. By their great numbers and their peculiar status in 19th-century Polish society, Jews played a substantial role at all levels of this economic transformation.

The Jewish Oil Magnates of Galicia – a hybrid volume that includes a historical study by Valerie Schatzker and a translation of the 1954 Yiddish novel The Jewish Oil Magnates by Julien Hirszhaut – tells this story with verve and impressive detail.

Schatzker's historical portrait, covering roughly a century, acts as an introduction to Hirszhaut's novel. Both documents serve as careful studies of the impact and risks of modern resource economies, while presenting a clear-eyed portrait of eastern European Jewish life before World War II.

The Galician breakthroughs in resource development were sudden and far-reaching. The landscape in the shadow of the Carpathian Mountains had always oozed what were referred to as "oil seeps." These provided materials used in medicine, as lubricant, for the tanning of leather, and the production of soap and candles.

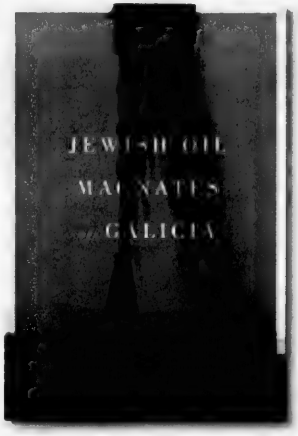
The first leap beyond this low-tech era followed the development of a market for ozokerite, a wax that proved an excellent and much less expensive alternative to beeswax for candle making. Mined in haphazardly dug and timbered shafts under the ground, wax was distilled by placing encrusted stones in vats of cold water, which were stirred with paddles. When the ozokerite rose to the surface it was skimmed and boiled in cauldrons over open fires. The recovered, purified wax provided a far cleaner, non-odorous, pleasantly white material for Sabbath candle-making and for the candles used in Russian Orthodox churches.

In the 1850s, a Galician pharmacist in Lemberg was among the first to successfully distil crude oil into naphtha, a "clear, odourless fuel for lamps." This technological advance led to the earliest installation of gas lamps on Drohobycz's streets, as well as to the first instance of a European railway using gas to illuminate its rail cars.

By 1875, shafts in the area of Boryslav, one of the key towns in south-eastern Poland, numbered in the thousands. Photographs of the area in this period are reminiscent of Standard Oil's Pennsylvania oil fields. Wooden derricks with their box-like caps, rough workers' shacks, haphazard fencing and roadways stretch as far as the eye can see.

A large Jewish underclass populated the wax-mining economy; independent Jewish owners sunk mines; while a number of "magnates" – naft-magnatn in Yiddish – lorded over newly made fortunes. They built mansions in nearby Drohobycz to escape the environmental disaster that befell Boryslav in the immediate area of derricks and mining.

As Schatzker tells it, mine fields became a kind of "Galician Hell": "Water run-off from the mines was left to wash away the soil, flood the low-lying areas, turn roads and fields to mud, and cause houses in the towns to sink below the street level. Boardwalks had to be built to pass over ditches filled with stinking, rotting refuse, so that pedestrians could navigate the streets."



The Jewish Oil Magnates of Galicia
A History, 1853-1945 by Valerie Schatzker and a Novel by Julien Hirszhaut
McGill-Queen's UP

In the following decades came an all-out oil boom, which reached its height in the years before World War I. From each shift in the petroleum industry came new forms of labour; new depths of environmental damage; new attractions for local and international investors; new unpredictability associated with the boom and its inevitable bust.

Hirszhaut's novelistic treatment of these developments is well matched to Schatzker's meticulous historical introduction. Following the model of epic Yiddish novels of the early 20th century, Hirszhaut depicts the full transformation of the Galician economy and its major towns in the second half of the 19th century. His characters represent all rungs of the social ladder, from the bottom – the lepaks who, digging in ditches, would "scoop out the thicker layer of oil with pails and then sponge the shallow layers with bunches of grasses or reeds" – to the magnates at the top. In scenes set in their Drohobycz mansions, magidim and paupers mix with social workers, mayors' deputies, and Polish landowning gentry.

Hirszhaut's ability to present his narrative convincingly comes in part from his own youth in Drohobycz and his later studies in law and politics in nearby Lvov (called Lemberg in his novel). Before the war he wrote for a variety of Yiddish and Polish language publications. He spent the early war years in hiding in Warsaw until he was captured and found himself in the Germans' notorious Pawiak prison. After the war he helped rebuild the postwar Yiddish press as well as social services in Lodz, Bialystok, Katowice, Krakow, Lublin and Warsaw. Hirszhaut was among the first to collect survivors' testimonies in postwar Poland. In the 1950s he settled in New York where he remained a key Yiddish journalist and editor. He died in 1983.

The original Yiddish novel, Yidishe Nafi-Magnatn, appeared in the same Buenos Aires-based series devoted to postwar Yiddish writing that included an early version of Elie Wiesel's Night. Though Hirszhaut's book is not related to Holocaust writing, its publication in 1954 was part of the series' goal of recovering writings and documents associated with Polish Jewish culture and society. Reading the novel today is akin to sitting in a time machine. Galician forests, the Boryslaw Klondike, Drohobycz millionaires, the distant Vienna court of the Hapsburg emperor, the great chassidic courts and the rising enlightenment ideals of the maskilim inhabit Hirszhaut's novel, distinct and ghostly at the same time. ■

Golf pro humbled by his success

Russell Budd

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Every day, Russell Budd wakes up and finds himself face to face with his career goals. Written on Post-it notes, the goals are everywhere: plastered on doors and stuck to the bathroom mirror. To him, they serve as both reminder and reinforcement.

"If you keep telling yourself something and you see it often enough, you start to believe it," Budd says. "It starts to become reality."

The notices are necessary. The Toronto native is in his second year as a professional golfer and knows that becoming complacent for even a few days could have major repercussions for his career.

"It's a humbling sport," he says. "You can't get too high, you can't get too low. You have to figure out and find the positive in every disappointment."

Budd, 24, had to make a big mental adjustment in July after almost losing his grip on a tournament lead. He led by three strokes going into the second of a two-day contest at the Mandarin Golf and Country Club in Richmond Hill, Ont. However, a bogey and double bogey on the last two holes forced a playoff round with two other golfers.

Nevertheless, he persevered for his first professional win. That victory began a great season for Budd who took home his next first-place finish on Aug. 5 at another Mandarin Tour event in Richmond Hill.

Later that month, he shot a 69 at a qualifier for the PGA Tour Canada.

"I'm ahead of where I thought I would be at this time," he admits. "I feel very comfortable with myself and I'm enjoying what I'm doing, which is the biggest thing."

Regardless, there is no room for Budd to become too confident with his abilities. Unlike athletes in other sports, Budd cannot deflect to a teammate if he is having an off day. All of the blame falls on him, he says, so self-motivation is key.

Budd, who attended DePaul University on a golf scholarship and graduated in 2013, says that writing down his feelings is a helpful tool. If he is struggling during a round, he says he can think back to positive thoughts he scribbled down.

For instance, if he makes a note that humming a certain song in his head will make him feel better, Budd will use that to get him out of a funk on the course.

"Once you're out there in a tournament, your emotions can't be like a roller- coaster. You have to keep it pretty flat," he says. "I'm learning how to do that better."

To keep his game in tip-top shape through the year, Budd spends the winter golfing in southern Florida. There, he hits the course for practice at 7 a.m. and doesn't return home until the evening.

Budd says that if he returns to his residence and doesn't feel exhausted, he didn't push himself far enough.

"The good thing about this year is I've had to change my goals three times over the course of the last month," Budd says. "It's a good problem to have when you have to change goals because you're achieving them."

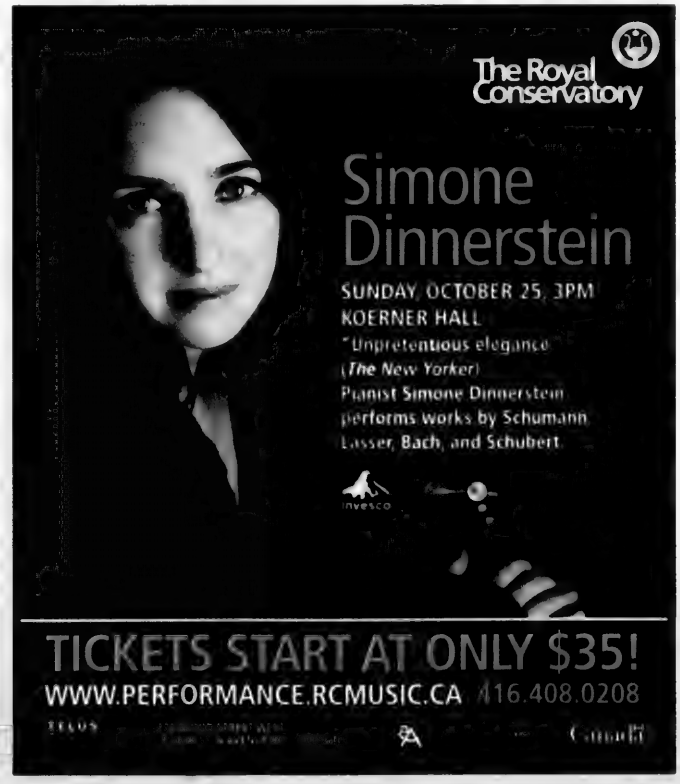
As for his next goals, Budd says he wants to keep his status with the PGA Tour Latinoamérica. Meanwhile, good tournament results will also help him keep his career afloat financially.

However, tournament entry fees can be pricey – especially for qualifying school, where Budd plays to qualify for top golf tours. Several of those entry fees can run upward of $2,000.

Budd has one sponsor, condo developer Camrost-Felcorp, and is currently looking for more sponsorship as his game improves. He estimates that his annual expenses are between $75,000 and $80,000 (US).

While the sport is an expensive endeavour, Budd remains confident that he will continue hitting and putting for life.

"I wouldn't even know what to do with a desk job," he says. "I hope I never have to wear a suit to go to work. I like being able to go somewhere with a bunch of grass and where the sun is shining every single day." ■



Wrestling our way into the new year

Evelyn Tauben

This can be a complicated time of year for Jews. The High Holidays are filled with possibility, liveliness and people coming together, but also with struggle, and not just the kind of soul-searching and grappling inherent in the Days of Awe.

In recent weeks, many have found themselves sitting inside a synagogue they rarely go to and reading words they barely understand, let alone believe in. All this comes as our work lives get back into gear after the lull of summer, and our children begin the first days of school. Meetings are being set, projects are beginning, and then we pull out of it all. These decisions do not come easy for so many of us who straddle two worlds, leaving more than a few cynically questioning: what do I do it for? What do I actually want? What do I believe in?

Rabbi Brian Besser teaches that skepticism is a kind of prayer, noting that "Israel" means "one who struggles with God." The name of Israel is proclaimed in the Bible for the first time when Jacob wrestles with a stranger. Before releasing his grasp, Jacob insists on receiving a blessing, to which the stranger responds: "Your name shall no longer be Jacob, but Israel, for you have striven with beings divine and human, and have prevailed" (Genesis 32:29).

For centuries, this iconic biblical story has been fodder for artists such as Rembrandt, Eugene Delacroix and Paul Gauguin. In Toronto, we have a remarkable sculpture of this scene by the distinguished Jewish artist Nathan Rapoport, best known for his striking memorial to the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in Warsaw and also at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

In the Toronto sculpture, Rapoport compresses the events of the night-long struggle into a single, stirring moment. In the same gesture in which the two figures wrestle, the angel benevolently reaches out an imposing hand over Jacob's head, subtly making the priestly sign of the kohanim with fingers parted, foreshadowing Jacob receiving his blessing.

The intensity of the action is contained in the embracing, curving sweep of the angel's wings. There is both a solidity and lightness to Rapoport's distinct handling of the subject, with the angel hovering overhead and Jacob bracing himself against a rocky surface. Although the artists mentioned above, working in two dimensions, were free from the limitations of gravity to represent the story in any way their imaginations would allow, they all depicted scenes with both figures locked in a close grip, firmly grounded on land. The viewer bears witness to a tense, intimate battle.

By contrast, the openness of Rapoport's composition provides an opening for the viewer to see himself within the action. To my knowledge, Rapoport's circular design in conceiving of this biblical narrative is highly unique. The structure is reminiscent of the emphasis placed on circularity at this time in the Jewish calendar, when we take stock of circling through another year, and measure the continuity of life and the seasons. The viewer is drawn into the exchange between the struggling figures, and the open form and dynamic movement in Rapoport's sculpture connects us to the surroundings. Through it, we see trees, passing people and the activity of a community, and are reminded of our place within the struggle.

Jacob Wrestling the Angel* (1977) by Nathan Rapoport (b. 1911, Warsaw – d. 1987, New York) is located on the Sherman Campus of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

> The openness of Rapoport's composition provides an opening for the viewer to see himself within the action

Rapoport once stated that the statue symbolizes the Jewish People committed to fighting for their destiny. At this time of year, when many of us are confronted with a fundamental conflict of how to be Jewish in a modern world, here is a reminder – an endorsement even – that skepticism and struggling to find a place within Jewish customs and community is the kind of resistant engagement that our tradition embraces. The melding of both wrestling and embrace that Rapoport has captured in his enduring work of art demonstrates how passionate affection and contentious conflict can appear similar, and are often experienced in a symbiotic relationship. Wrestling with tradition implies a fond connection to it.

May 5776 be filled with nourishing struggle! ■

ASK ELLA

An empty nest means you've done it right

Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

A few weeks ago, my husband and I drove our son to McGill University in Montreal. On our drive home, we discussed how happy we were to have finally reached a stage where both boys are in university.

Now that it has sunk in and my husband is off to work every day, I am finding myself moping around, constantly depressed. The house is too quiet. When I open the front door, there is no one playing guitar, no music blaring, no mess, no negotiations about the car, and no one expecting dinner. I never thought I would feel so empty.

I'm very happy for both my sons, but this empty nester thing is truly for the birds. How am I going to move on from feeling so lost and not needed?

Sadly Alone at Last

Dear Sadly Alone at Last

Having your last child leave home opens up a whole barrage of emotions. Everything from joy, relief and well-deserved pride for having done a great job as a parent, to sadness, worry and loneliness. You have entered a new stage in your life, and you need to allow yourself time to adjust. This is also a new phase as a parent, as a wife and as an individual.

You've raised your boys with the hopes of getting them to this milestone. You've given them the tools they need to become productive, self-sufficient adults, and now it's time to let go and let them put all the life skills you have instilled to work.

You probably put your family's needs above your own, and it will take time and action to re-adjust that thought process and fill the void with things that continue to make you feel fulfilled. You could volunteer, go back to work, take some courses, join a book club, travel, join a health club, revive or start a hobby, go out on dates with your husband, get a dog, take up golf – the list is endless.

Remember: your boys are not gone for good, and believe me, they still need you and always will. Allow yourself time to make this new adjustment.

Try to plan your week in advance. In the beginning, you might be lunching a lot with friends you never had time for in the past, but eventually you will want to remake yourself and find the new right fit.

Remember that your sons are always accessible. You can reach out by phone, text, FaceTime, Facebook or even visits. You've done a wonderful job as a parent, now it's your turn, embrace this new transition.

Dear Ella,

I have three children, 9, 6 and 4. My baby started all-day junior kindergarten this week. My full-time job as a mom has abruptly come to an end.

Usually, when the bus picks up the older boys, my daughter and I begin our full day of activities, but when I waved good-bye to her this morning, my heart sank down to the pit of my stomach. I spent so much time preparing her for this moment, but I never thought about what it would do to me.

I jumped in my car and chased the bus, only to find her getting off at the other end seeming quite content. She wasn't in tears, but I was! I cried all the way home. I should be happy, not miserable.

Baby in School

Dear Baby in School

Relinquishing the care of your last baby to someone else, a virtual stranger, is certainly traumatic, and there is no reason to trivialize it. However, your job as a full-time mom has not abruptly come to an end, it has simply changed.

You just went from being needed every waking moment to an empty house for a few hours with time for your own thoughts and the luxury of making your own schedule without a kid hanging off of you. Your feelings are real and natural, and you have to allow yourself the time to work through them – time to grieve your old routine so you can create a new one that's just as productive.

You've done a great job as a mom in the last nine years raising your little miracles to go into the world. Although it's a difficult change for you, it's also a good one. Time to add another layer to your already accomplished, full life.

But remember: you only have a few hours until that school bus arrives and your house is full of kids once again, all shouting mommy and needing you like they were never gone. ■

Sukkot | Exodus 33:12-34:26

Rabbi Ilan Acoca says we must act as living examples for our future generations
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explains why rain is God's way of keeping us honest
Rabbi Catharine Clark argues that the Torah is not meant to be comfortable reading

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

As we approach Simchat Torah every year, I have mixed feelings.

On the one hand, my heart is filled with joy and a sense of accomplishment!

Another year has passed by, and we are ready to finish a cycle of Torah and restart it again with songs and tunes of our Sephardi chachamim. Being the only Sephardi congregation west of Toronto gives me a sense of responsibility as well. Here we are being part of Am Israel, continuing an ancient tradition.

On the other hand, I feel concerned and a little nervous. I am thinking about the future. Will these traditions be preserved by the next generation? Am I doing enough to guarantee it?

A couple of years ago, I had a visitor from out of town who happened to be an accomplished lay leader in the Sephardi community where he lives. I had the chance to share with him my concerns about the future of Sephardi Judaism and he gave me wise advice. He said: "Continue what you are doing! Teach and propagate, and the rest is up to God."

The day after I got his advice happened to be Shabbat, and my son Nissim Shalom, who was eight years old at that time, read the Haftorah, as is traditional in Sephardi communities.

After the reading, I invited the Sephardi leader to share some words. He started by saying, "Your rabbi is concerned about the future of Sephardi Judaism, but after such a beautiful Haftorah reading by his son, I assure him there is a bright future for Sephardi Judaism."

His words warmed my heart and gave me a sense of comfort, inspiration and mission.

Let us all take this message to heart and teach by being living examples to our future generations. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Rain occupies the thoughts of Jews at this season. We go outside to our sukkot, the huts that remind us of our historic trek through the wilderness and the need for shelter, hoping that there will be no rain. Paradoxically, we take the four plants that symbolize agricultural fertility – lulav (palm), hadas (myrtle), aravah (willow) and etrog (citron) – and circle the synagogue with the Hoshanot prayers for rain and fecundity. The holiday season culminates with Shmini Atzeret (Simchat Torah is a later addition to the sacred calendar) with the piyyut (poem) noting the change to the rainy season in the Land of Israel and our prayer that the winter months ahead be blessed with wet weather.

In her evocative exploration Rain, Cynthia Barnett writes of the atmospheric balance that differentiates Earth from the other planets. Rain was essential to the birth of life and is basic to its ongoing sustenance. She speculates that climatic conditions gave rise to different religious outlooks. Certainly, for Judaism and other monotheistic religions born in the arid Middle East, "Rain is God's way of keeping us honest."

The striking image of the sukkah reminds us, as do all the pilgrimage festivals, of the specific covenant of the Jewish People with God. We celebrate the particular elements of our identities as Jews. But the lulav and etrog, associated with natural growth, remind us that the entire world depends on an adequate supply of water. On Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, we speak of the special love between God and the people of Israel. We also pray for the blessing of rain. As Rabbi Tanhum bar Hiyya taught (midrash on Psalms 117), "The giving of Torah gives joy to the people of Israel; the falling of rain brings joy to the entire world." Our covenantal love is secure enough to share our blessings with others. ■

Rabbi Catharine Clark

Like many people, when I'm busy at work or feeling overwhelmed as a parent, I turn to a comfort food. Grilled cheese sandwiches are my favourite, but everyone has their own go-to dish. Often, I also turn to a "comfort book." An example would be any book from the Harry Potter series. They have a happy ending, and they are predictable, especially to me, because I've read them countless times before.

At Simchat Torah, as we finish Dvarim and roll back the scroll to begin again at Bereshit, it can be tempting to read the Torah as a comfort book. After all, we have read the Torah many times. We read it each year, and many of you have heard the key stories since childhood. These early stories are important formative experiences, but age-appropriate tellings of the Torah mean that many themes have been glossed over or omitted entirely.

Our task as adults is to read the Torah not as a comfort book, but as a challenge book. A challenge book is one that tests the boundaries of your comprehension, life values or behavioural comfort zone.

Pushing the boundaries of your comprehension could mean reading the weekly parshah in Hebrew, rather than English. To clarify your values, perhaps pay particular attention to the stories of the patriarchs and matriarchs that did not make the Talmud Torah curriculum. For instance, in Genesis Chapter 12, read about the proposition Abram made to his wife Sarai. How desperate would your situation have to be before you would propose or accept a similar deal? To expand your behavioural comfort zone, volunteer at your synagogue to chant Torah on Shabbat or at weekday minyan. Yes, you might be very nervous that morning, but the Torah is not meant to be a comfort book. ■

Easy desserts to sweeten your holiday meal

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When you have a small someone in the household who wants to help you prepare dessert, the easiest thing to make is a dump cake.

First, let me say the moniker is at once brilliant and misleading, and kind of fun. You literally dump your ingredients, in layers, into a bowl or pan and bake it.

Cake mix, fruit or flavour, a fat, sometimes chocolate or nuts, and whatever your taste buds fancy. The extra bonus is that family members of all ages (and cooking expertise) can participate in the prep for the holidays.

Peachy strawberry dump cake

- ❑ 2 cups frozen sliced strawberries, thawed with juices
- ❑ 2 cups frozen sliced peaches, thawed with juices
- ❑ 1 box strawberry cake mix
- ❑ 1 stick butter or margarine, melted

For the glaze

- ❑ 1 1/2 cups powdered sugar
- ❑ 3 tbsp. whipping cream or rice milk

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9 x13-in. baking pan. Pour fruit and juices into the prepared pan. Pour the box of cake mix over the fruit. Pour the melted butter over the cake mix and bake for 25 to 35 minutes, until it becomes golden and bubbly. Remove and let cool for 10 minutes before drizzling the glaze over the top

To make glaze: In a bowl, combine the powdered sugar and cream and mix until smooth. Drizzle the glaze over the top of the cake. Serves 10 to 12.

Marshmallow apple pie spice dump cake

- ❑ 1 box spice cake mix
- ❑ 10 oz bag of mini marshmallows
- ❑ 1 can of apple pie filling
- ❑ 1 stick of melted butter or margarine

Preheat oven to 350. In a greased 9 x13-in. baking pan spread the can of apple pie filling evenly across bottom of the pan. Sprinkle the cake mixture evenly over the pie filling. Shake the pan slightly so the cake mixture spreads evenly over the filling. Pour the melted butter evenly over the cake mix. Some clumping will happen, this is okay, don't worry about it. Bake for 45 minutes. Remove immediately and sprinkle the mini-marshmallows over the top of the cake. Turn up the oven to broil and place the cake in the oven for no more than 30 to 45 seconds. Watch it closely as it will burn. Remove from the oven immediately and let cool for 5 minutes before serving. Serves 8 to 10.

Chocolate cherry dump cake

- ❑ 1 can cherry pie filling
- ❑ 1 can pitted dark sweet cherries
- ❑ 1 package chocolate cake mix
- ❑ 1 cup chopped pecans
- ❑ 1/2 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
- ❑ 3/4 cup butter or margarine, cut into pieces

Preheat oven to 375. Grease a 9x13-in. baking dish. Dump the cherry pie into the pan and spread it evenly over the bottom of the pan. Spoon the cherries, including juice over the top of the filling. Sprinkle the cake mix over the top of the fruit. Don't stir, just shake the pan a bit to make sure the cake is evenly distributed over the fruit. Sprinkle the chopped pecans and chocolate chips over the top. Dot the butter pieces evenly over the top. Bake for 45 minutes. Serves 10 to 12.

Salt caramel chocolate dump cake

- ❑ 1 small package instant chocolate pudding
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups cold milk
- ❑ 1 box devil's food cake mix
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups chopped caramels
- ❑ coarse sea salt for sprinkling
- ❑ 1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
- ❑ whipped cream, for serving (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9 x 13-in. pan and set aside.

In a large bowl combine the chocolate pudding and milk. Mix for 1 minute. Add the cake mix and mix until combined. Spread batter evenly over the bottom of prepared pan (it will be very thick). Sprinkle the chopped caramels over the top and then sprinkle the sea salt (not too much) on top of the caramel. Bake 30 to 40 minutes, just until the edges pull away from sides and a toothpick inserted in the cake portion comes out clean.

Remove cake from oven and let cool on a cooling rack.

Pour chocolate chips into a medium microwave-safe bowl. Microwave on high for 2-3 minutes, stirring every 30 seconds, until chocolate is fully melted. Using a spoon, drizzle chocolate over cooled cake. Serves 10 to 12. ■

Rabbi Paysach Krohn: become a giving person

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Paysach Krohn, a New York-based fifth-generation mohel was 21 when he became the youngest mohel ever certified. He is the author of 12 books, eight of which are part of a series that feature stories and anecdotes inspired by Rabbi Sholom Schwadron, a man known as the "Maggid of Jerusalem," and a lecturer on the subjects of ethics and spiritual growth. He spoke to The CJN in advance of his Sept. 20 lecture in Toronto, sponsored by Eitz Chaim Day School and held at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill.

What message are you bringing with you to the Toronto Jewish community?

I'm speaking about the act of giving. I'm talking about repentance during the period between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur and how we can improve ourselves.

I think one of the most important things is that every Jew should not only be thinking about what is best for them, but what is best for others and to become a giving person. And when you become a giving person, that is how you become closer to God because God sees that you care for others and in return, God cares for you. It's a measure for measure type of thing.

I'm talking about giving of your talents, giving of your time and giving of your energy. In the Torah, there is a word, venotnu. It's a palindrome and you can read it back and forth. It means, and "they shall give." What the commentaries explain is that word, which means to give to others, or that they shall give, is a palindrome because when you give to others, you get back as well.

What are some of the modern day challenges that might get in the way of spiritual growth?

There is no question that the lure of what's available on the Internet, what is available in general in the world takes away from spiritual growth. There is no question that what everyone is exposed to, not only children, is a great deal of immorality, a great deal of freedom, a great deal of things that are really against what the Torah would want a Jew to be like.

What are some of the biggest crises young Jews face today that may not have been issues in past generations?

The fact that many of us text and email puts a [strain] on relationships, on emotional relationships. We utter two words to each other and that is enough. In years gone by, if a writer like yourself wanted to interview somebody, you would have to call them. You and I corresponded, until today with email ,and each email was five or 10 words at the most. You can't build relationships and friendships that way. There is no emotional stability. Because of that, there are many people who are lacking the capability of being close to other people.

There are husbands and wives who are texting each other and are not talking to each other. One of the things I ask in some of my speeches is, "When was the last time you had a conversation with your child? When was the last time a husband and wife had a conversation?"

What might be standing in the way of someone's ability to give of oneself?

Unfortunately, today, we have a tremendous amount of needs. We have financial needs, we have emotional needs and we have social needs. And when people feel they are not satisfied, either financially, emotionally or socially, they do not look to help others in that vein, because they are too busy getting satisfied and getting what they feel they need to have a decent life.

Rabbi Paysach Krohn

> Do a favour for someone..Do you know what that does to a person?

How would you guide someone in taking the first steps towards getting in the habit of giving of oneself?

One of the things I always propose, and many people have followed it, is to keep a notebook where you do one favour for someone else every single day. You do not go to sleep until you have done a favour for someone else. I'm not talking about a husband to his wife, or parents to children. That you do because that is what life is all about. You have to do that if you know what is good for you and want to have a decent relationship with your spouse. You have to do good for each other. But I'm talking about something out of the house.

I'll give you a small example, something I'm involved with right now. There is a person who is in jail and I write him a postcard every single day. He's in jail for whatever reason. He made a mistake and he's doing his time, but the whole world has forgotten about him. Who writes him? Who goes to see him? His family is far away so they can't always get there. He is basically a forgotten person, but he's a human being and he's going to be out eventually. But when someone writes him a card, it makes him feel that somebody cares.

Do a favour for someone, whether it is taking a child to school, visiting someone in a nursing home, making a call to someone who is alone, or getting involved in helping a widow or a divorced single mother. Single mothers are one of the most neglected [groups] in society. I'm involved with widow organizations and divorced mother organizations.

Call a woman who is alone at home with her kids. For the widow, everyone has compassion, but not so much with divorced women, for whatever reason. Call her and say, "Listen, I'm at Costco, I'm shopping, is there anything I can pick up for you?" Do you know what that does to a person? That is an unbelievable act of concern. It's a small thing, but it means so much to them.

You made that person's day because you made them feel that somebody cares. ■

Nachmanides' defence of Judaism

Backstory

JONATHAN L. MILEVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Any serious study of Nachmanides' Disputation in Barcelona in 1263 would need to include a careful analysis of his sermon, Torat HaShem Temimah. The sermon, which was delivered in the largest synagogue in Barcelona, was not only prepared in the same summer, it was actually delivered on the last day of the disputation, following a missionary appeal by King James of Aragon.

The overlap between the contents of the sermon and the disputation is relatively clear. Firstly, Nachmanides explicitly speaks about Christianity in the sermon. Secondly, he discusses the ultimate redemption, a major point of contention at the disputation, as Pablo Christiani, his adversary, brought rabbinic sources that appear to say that the messiah had already come.

The sermon should not be read simply as a contemporary document, but as a valuable source to gain an insight into Nachmanides' thought processes about his role in the disputation. Besides the obvious, but challenging, task of proving the authenticity of the Jewish tradition (possibly in the presence of his Christian detractors, although historian Salo Baron and scholar Rabbi Charles Chavel cast doubt on the possibility that the king and Christiani were in attendance by the time Nachmanides' sermon started), Nachmanides chose to make an even bolder argument. He was suggesting that Judaism is the only faith, not just the best one. This idea can be seen in four ways:

First, in addition to some broad themes, including the purpose of the narrative in the Bible, the wisdom of the Jewish tradition and its followers, the explanation for the commandments, he speaks about the patriarch Abraham's defence of his own beliefs and the hardship he is said to have endured as a result. By adding this midrash to his sermon, Nachmanides seems to be presenting himself as an Abraham defending the one true faith and who would also be likely to face hardship for publicly expressing his views.

Second, this can be seen from the way Nachmanides contends with Maimonides' view that Christianity brought the world closer to monotheism. Nachmanides responds to this claim in two ways. He says that, since the start of Christianity, there had been more confusion about the law, not less. He also says that those without access to the Torah are compared to "cattle." Nachmanides thus turns Maimonides' point on its head by arguing that Christianity has not made that much progress: by translating and reading the Torah, the nations of the world have simply become human; not godly.

Third, Nachmanides precludes the possibility of the existence of other genuine faiths. He does so when he states that without knowledge of the Creator, it is impossible to ascertain the purpose of creation. The logical outcome of this statement is that a faith that develops based on a natural theology – that is, what it ascertains from nature alone – would be "[cognizant of] neither commandment not transgression."

Fourth, Nachmanides' view of Judaism as the only faith can be seen from the exclusivity that he grants to prayer. When Nachmanides explains the reason for prayer – namely, an opportunity for people to assemble and express thankfulness to God for having been created – he seems to imply that Jews are the only people who pray. He knew, however, that Christians pray as well. By stating this so one-sidedly and matter-of-factly, Nachmanides betrays his assumption that Jewish prayer is the only prayer, at least as far as he is concerned. This reinforces the idea that Nachmanides presents Judaism as the one and only faith.

Nachmanides, who was by then 69, had earned quite a reputation. As Prof. David Novak has said, he was by that point "a halachic authority respected in all quarters of the Jewish world." His erudition, sharp mind, and exegetical skills, which helped him defend his faith throughout the disputation, are on full display in the sermon.

Still, his task was not an easy one. ■

Polo founder steps aside, and Nazi shocker in France

Fashion icon hands over reins

Ralph Lauren – born Ralph Lifshitz – said last week that's he's stepping down as CEO of the billion-dollar corporation that bears his name and has become synonymous with preppy style. Lauren, 76, tapped Stefan Larsson, the president of Gap's Old Navy branch, to succeed him in the post at Ralph Lauren Corp., but said he'll stay on as executive chairman and chief creative officer. Lauren is the son of Jewish immigrants from Belarus and grew up in New York City. He founded Polo in 1967, beginning with a line of neckties. It now includes men's, women's and kids' clothing, as well as home furnishings. Lauren holds more than 81 per cent of its common stock.

A Nice swastika?

A large Nazi banner unfurled in Nice, France, on Sept. 29 caused an outcry among locals and tourists after it was hung for a film being directed by Canadian Christian Duguay. The red banner with a swastika hung from the Palais de la Prefecture for two days during filming of an adaptation of Joseph Joffo's Shoah memoir A Bag of Marbles. "People started screaming," tourist Andrew Gentry told the BBC. "They were really agitated." The prefecture reportedly alerted people ahead of time and warned the city's Jewish residents. Still, many onlookers were puzzled, while some took selfies with the banner. In World War II, Waffen SS chief Alois Brunner stayed in Nice's Hotel Excelsior to plan round-ups of Jews. The memoir describes Joffo's journey from Nazi-occupied Paris to a safer city in southeast France. The film is a remake of a French one from 1975.

Musicians keep Tel Aviv hotel staff busy

Hip hop artist Kanye West was in Israel last week for a Sept. 30 concert in Ramat Gan. West, like many celebrities, stayed at the Dan Tel Aviv in the hotel's royal suite. His entourage, including personal bodyguards, occupied 40 rooms in the five-star hotel. When West checked out Oct. 1, the hotel had to quickly turn over his rooms, as rocker Jon Bon Jovi and his band arrived, ahead of their Oct. 3 Tel Aviv gig. But to the likely relief of hotel staff, they only occupied 20 rooms. ■

Response to the United Church

Gail Allan, as spokesperson for the United Church of Canada, invokes the quest for "justice and peace" as her church's purpose in investing so much energy in anti-Israel activities ("United Church responds," Sept. 24). She claims that the United Church's "action does not target Israel. Rather, the focus is Israeli policies and practices relating to the occupation of Palestinian territories."

If Allan wished the readers of her letter to believe in "justice and peace" as the motive for choosing Israel for special attention, her position may be slightly more credible if the United Church made motions against China for occupying Tibet, Turkey for northern Cyprus, Russia for the Crimea, Morocco for Western Sahara, etc. The "selection" of Israel for condemnation betrays the underlying, irrefutable, anti-Semitic motivation driving the action of the United Church of Canada.

Views on marijuana

I am very disappointed that The CJN would publish an article (with a front page cartoon to make matters worse) that promotes the use of marijuana and practically endorses it with a Jewish hechsher ("The complicated halachahs of getting high," Sept. 24).

I have worked with people and their families suffering from addictions for more than 20 years. There is no glamour when dealing with the consequences of addiction, be it mental health, financial hardship, involvement with the law, and of course, family and relationship breakdowns.

Marijuana is not a benign "medicine" as your article portrays, especially when in the hands of youth and susceptible adults with concurrent mental health disorders.

This says nothing of the detrimental physical health effects of marijuana, including respiratory and cardiovascular risks. It is irresponsible to only state the "potential benefits" of this drug.

Furthermore, it is insulting to me as a Jew that marijuana should be a vehicle to become more "spiritual." To me, that is a failure in the most fundamental sense of what it means to be a Jew.

Thea Weisdorf
Toronto

As a parent of two young men, I was appalled to see the Sept. 24 cover of The CJN.

I thoroughly discourage the use of smoking pot in our family. This week, you put an illustration of a young Jewish man clearly smoking pot with a smile on his face, depicting that this activity is accepted, good and calming for young men.

May I remind you that this activity in Canada is still illegal. This kind of image creates the illusion that this is an OK activity. It is not! It doesn't help to see this image in our home for a week.

I know that the article discusses more of this issue. It is the cover that is awful and irresponsible. I have disposed of the cover and kept the rest of the paper for reading, although I am so disgusted by this irresponsible choice, I can't bring myself to read the paper yet.

Suzanne Reisler Litwin
Montreal

I enjoyed the article on marijuana and what Rabbi Daniel Korobkin had to say.

I would just like to point out that marijuana is not a gateway drug and that marijuana is mentioned in the Bible. It says, "let he who sins be stoned!" I think a few of us have sinned once or twice!

Howard Dover

Why we start with Kol Nidrei

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz is puzzled over the purpose of the Kol Nidrei prayer, writing that it is "more melody than meaning" (Sept. 17). Perhaps this analogy might shed light on its purpose.

As a lawyer, I have always appreciated judges who commence a hearing by telling litigants they should relax and try to be at ease, even though the next few hours of trial might be stressful. The Kol Nidrei prayer has a similar purpose. By assuring us that we are absolved of the vows we have made and the promises we have broken, we can relax and more easily endure our fast while we are being judged from on high. That is why the Yom Kippur service begins with Kol Nidrei and not the heavier "who by fire, who by stoning" prayer of Unetaneh Tokef.

And as Rabbi Steinmetz notes, it does have a great melody.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Too afraid to talk about God

Clergy are hesitant to exclude agnostic or atheist Jews, and the questions involved are difficult to confront, so the topic often goes unaddressed

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: I was fascinated by a recent opinion piece in the New York Times by economist Seth Stephens-Davidowitz, headlined "Googling for God." The author suggests that Internet searches implying skepticism and doubt regarding religion were on the increase.

Seemingly, many of the faithful are willing to share their spiritual doubts from behind the safety of their computer screens, but are much less likely to confront their clergymen and women with similar expressions of uncertain faith.

Admittedly, God-talk is not a definitive feature of most of our synagogues. My suspicion is that the more traditionalist the community or rabbi, the less often one is likely to hear a sermon or a lecture on the subject of God. Like many, if not most, rabbis, my sermons tend to focus on observance, Jewish learning, morality, Israel, and rarely if at all on the topic of God.

I would need a second Yom Kippur for atonement were I to place God and elephants in the same sentence, but I suspect that this, for traditional Jews, may be the proverbial elephant in the room: our hesitation to address fundamental issues of belief in the Creator of the universe, which, at least according to the Rambam, is the first of all mitzvot.

Are we rabbis hesitant to focus on belief for fear that we would open a door to doubt that would better remain closed?

Rabbi Finegold: I can only speak for my own practice, but I fear that I fall squarely into your categorization. I teach adults extensively and I often avoid the topic of God. Maybe this is wrong, but this is often a clear decision on my part.

I don't want to alienate those in the room that are clearly already agnostic or atheistic. My feeling is that these individuals are more and more present and more and more vocal in our communities, whether we like it or not. And while my belief in a divine being is strong, I don't want those that do not have the same conviction to feel there is no room for them in my big tent.

If someone doesn't believe in God, but wants to sit in a Bible class and learn about their heritage, I want them to have that as a full and valid expression of their Judaism.

Rabbi Scheim: A prominent cantor once shared with me that he was an atheist. A very likable individual, his honesty impressed me, but I admit to having being troubled by the seeming conflict between his role as shliach tzibur, emissary of the people before God and his denial of belief in the existence of the recipient of the prayers he would so beautifully chant.

Likely, there are other cantors, rabbis and devoted practitioners of Jewish prayer who avoid the fundamental theological question of God's existence, because of the difficult questions that arise, especially in light of the tragic dimensions of the last century of Jewish history. Like you, I would never be dismissive of one who struggles with the concept of God, but would want to find a way to open the discussion, since intellectual honesty should accompany us in our pursuit of Jewish learning and practice.

Rabbi Finegold: When I teach classes about Judaism and sexuality, I invariably point out that the values presented in Jewish thought about sex are presented from a heteronormative and masculine point of view, but that this does not mean the values cannot be transferred to other forms of relationships.

Perhaps we need to talk more about God unabashedly and make a similar point. We should say that Jewish tradition has always placed God at the centre, and that we personally place God at the centre, but just because someone else does not doesn't make them unwelcome at the table anymore.

Perhaps there are other ways to be more inclusive. I would love to hear from people who have questions about God internally as to why they choose not to share them with their clergy as much as they do with Google. I am also curious as to how they feel when clergy do discuss God. Do they understand that it is a central part of their message and teaching, or does it turn them more away from religion as a result? ■

A new perspective on the holidays

My daughter was too young last year to have any real sense of what she was hearing during the shofar blasts on Rosh Hashanah. But this year, approaching her second birthday, I tried to prepare her for the holiday's aural experience. For a week leading up to the big day, we talked about the significance of the shofar and mimicked the three types of sounds she would hear in shul. On the way to synagogue for the first day of Rosh Hashanah, we reviewed the lessons of the previous week. She seemed to have it down.

As the ba'al tekiah took his place before the Ark and began to lead the congregation through the introductory prayers and blessings, I told her the big moment had finally arrived. "We have to be very, very quiet now," I whispered, "so that we can hear the shofar." The congregation grew silent as the first blast echoed through the sanctuary.

Then, before the shofar blower could launch into his next note, my daughter piped up for everyone to hear.

"What that noise?" she asked.

Ten days later, my wife and I packed up our daughter and her six-month-old brother and headed to shul for Yom Kippur services. There were toys and a cheerful babysitter in the basement playroom, but my daughter insisted on coming upstairs to the sanctuary. "OK," I said, "so long as you sit nicely – and quietly – next to me."

That didn't last long. Soon, she was wriggling away and wandering around amid the worshippers. Eventually, she took a seat on an empty bench in the women's section, where she munched on nuts and raisins and made conversation with some of the female congregants. She refused to budge – it was as though she knew she'd found a space where I couldn't easily retrieve her and quiet her down. Eventually, my wife had to escort her back downstairs.

Just a few days after that, my daughter and I stood together in our home as I tried to explain the lulav and etrog to her. "We're going to hold them in our hands now and make a brachah," I said. "And then we'll shake them in front of us, to the right side, behind our bodies, to the left, up and down."

She wrapped her fingers around the two oddities, and I cupped my hands around hers to make sure she didn't drop them. I recited the blessings, and told her it was now time for the shaking. She responded by immediately trying to take a bite out of the etrog.

These are my memories of the holiday season just passed, and, to be honest, it was the most I've enjoyed the holidays in a long time. My daughter's antics injected a dose of levity into those heavy days. I needed that.

In years past, the busy holiday season would inevitably put me in an anxious mood, obsessively reviewing and critiquing the year that was. There was still some of that this year, too, but the cloud lifted quickly. When there's so much to look forward to, I guess it's hard to get too worked up about the past. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

Visions of Rwanda: What a buffalo and a bird can teach us

Naomi Matlow

While on safari in Akagera National Park, a protected park of multiple ecosystems in eastern Rwanda along the Tanzanian border, one could not help but be struck by the beauty, warm winds and seamless flow of landscapes from African sahara to hippo-filled swampland in the span of a 10-minute jeep ride.

After about 45 minutes seeing topi after topi (topis are African antelopes, I would soon learn) I was getting a little weary. I could not help but think, "Where are the giraffes? Did I miss the zebras? Could we be the trip that actually gets to see the lions?"

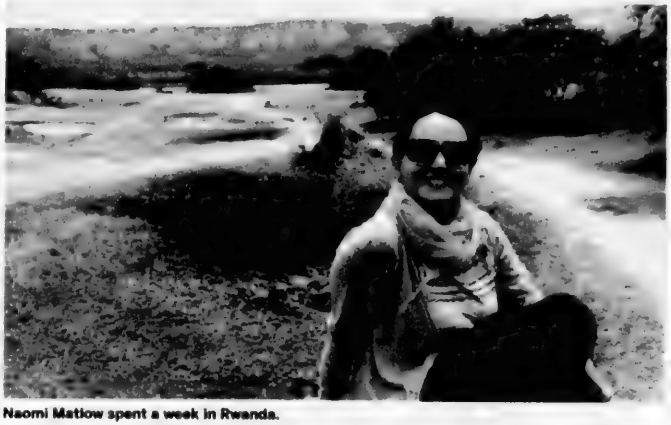
Ultimately, the lions were out of view because they sought shade from the heat, but the zebras, giraffes and the glimpse of two elephants grazing in the distance were everything that we could have possibly imagined.

However, it is the image of the buffalo resting with a small white bird atop its back that has been singed into my memory.

As our wonderful guide and park ranger Emmanuel told us, the Cape buffalo is often spotted with the oxpecker, a small white bird by his side. One could not help but question, how could a buffalo possibly befriend a small bird in the dog-eat-dog, or more specifically hippo-eat-lion, world that is the sub-Saharan wilderness?

We then learned that the oxpecker feeds off the ticks and insects that seek to feast on the buffalo. The buffalo in turn protects the oxpecker from the prey that would feast on it but for the deterrence effect of a giant buffalo being by its side. The result is the mutualism and beneficial co-existence that occurs between the buffalo and the bird.

From the outside looking in, this mutual relationship seems absurd and unbelievable. As I watched the two creatures, I imagined that 30 seconds later the buffalo would quickly grab the bird with his mouth and we would be audience to a true moment in the wild—lunchtime.



Naomi Matlow spent a week in Rwanda.

We in fact were witness to a true moment in the wild, but it was not the wild that I had imagined or anticipated. Perhaps that is because it was an occurrence seldom experienced in the human wild – the idea of peaceful co-existence to the point of mutual benefit. I thought: if the behemoth species that is the buffalo can find a way to live side-by-side with the meek and fragile oxpecker in a way that ensures both of their survivals, why can't we?

After a far too short week in Rwanda, it became clear to me that Rwanda is a country of possibility and a beacon of hope in a world where it often feels like co-existence is a near impossibility.

It is a jaw-dropping place from its vast rolling hills to the genuine kindness and heartfelt passion that I felt from the smallest human interaction. No person, like no country, goes through its existence unscathed. However the true test is how we as individuals or countries recognize our past histories in the effort to reshape our futures.

Rwanda is an incredible model of how people can live together and co-exist in a way that is mutually beneficial, though from the outside such an occurrence after so much devastation may seem impossible. In a country where 21 years ago neighbour took up arms against neighbour killing over one million Tutsis and Hutu moderates, how can security, government stability and social welfare be cornerstones for that same nation? How can Hutus and Tutsis now live in harmony and work side by side with the same goal of creating a stable and safe country?

I couldn't help but think "who is to say what is impossible?"

I was privileged to spend a week at the Agahozo-Shalom Youth Village (ASYV) on a JDC Entwine Insider Trip. Founded by the visionary role model, the late Anne Heyman, the ASYV is a youth village modelled after Yemin Orde in Israel, where 500 of Rwanda's most vulnerable youths live, learn and grow in a safe and supportive community built on family values.

While in the village, our group was given the special opportunity to witness incredible talents, share in thought-provoking discussions, dance, laugh, sing and experience the overflowing kindness and compassion of the magnificent students of the ASYV. Again I thought, who is to say what is impossible?

In addition to the residential community, the Liquidnet Family High School, the sports fields and the extra-curricular buildings, there is a solar field built by Gigawatt Global on the beautiful 144-acre ASYV oasis. This one solar field alone has increased the electrical capacity of Rwanda by six per cent in a country where only 15 per cent of the population has access to electricity. With Israeli inventors, Chinese products, French and German manufacturers and Rwandan contractors, the solar field is another model of mutual benefit.

People can work together in ways that benefit all that take part, and in Rwanda they do. Maybe we just need a little bit of a reminder of this possibility sometimes. I know I did.

If there is a place on this planet like Agahozo-Shalom, a place on this planet like Rwanda today, and a place where a buffalo can befriend a little white bird, maybe anything is possible. Maybe after all, the past does not dictate our future. ■

Together with composer Teresa Lotz she has written Three-TimesFast, a musical that was previewed at the International OCD Conference in Boston this past July. The balance between faith and modernity

In an excerpt from his new book, RABBI JOHN MOSCOWITZ reflects on his own unorthodox evolution

The late Israeli philosopher Ernst Simon often told the story of the last time Franz Kafka visited Berlin – in 1924, not long before the writer died, a month short of his 41st birthday. Walking through a park, Kafka came upon a little girl crying her eyes out. When he asked why she was in such distress, the girl sobbed that she had lost her doll.

Kafka was touched and saddened. He told the girl not to worry, that her doll had merely gone on a trip. In fact, he assured the girl, he knew the doll, having recently seen her as she was about to depart on a journey. Kafka promised that if the little girl returned to the park the next day, he would bring her a letter from her doll. And so each morning, over the next several weeks, Kafka brought a letter from the doll to his new friend, ostensibly written while on her trip.

During those weeks, Kafka grew more and more ill. He decided to return to Prague, but not before buying the girl another doll.

Accompanying the new doll was a letter written by Franz Kafka in which he insisted that, appearances to the contrary, this was indeed the doll that had belonged to the little girl. Admittedly, he told her, this doll looked different, but she had to understand that her doll had been on a long journey, had witnessed many remarkable sights, and had endured many difficult experiences. Life, Kafka wrote his young charge, had changed the doll's appearance.

The author in the Maasai Mara, Kenya, 2009.

Ismar Schorsch, former chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, says that while there are various possible meanings to the Kafka parable, he prefers this one: "That a transformative experience alters us externally, as well as internally." I suspect that Schorsch had Jews in mind here.

Schorsch's observation explains a good deal about us: who we are as Jews today and how circumstances have radically changed us over time, transforming not just our religious culture but, more profoundly so, ourselves. Like the doll in the Kafka story, we might wish we were the same, but we are not. Not at all.

I don't so much mean the externals of dress and language, where and even how we live. Or even this remarkable statistic (more than 20 years old now): approximately 98 per cent of Jews no longer reside in the place in which at least one grandparent was born. I refer to the deeper, the more telling metamorphosis: how we as Jews think, how we think about the Jews, how we think about other people, how we wish others to think about us.

Kafka famously wrote in Letter to His Father:

"You really had brought some traces of Judaism with you from the ghetto-like village community; it was not much and it dwindled a little more in the city and during your military service, but still, the impressions and memories of your youth did just about suffice for some sort of Jewish life... Even in this, there was still Judaism enough, but it was too little to be handed on to the child; it all dribbled away while you were passing it on."

I was no different from Kafka, really, and perhaps neither were you. Off I went to rabbinical school, not to be a rabbi but hungry for knowledge and in search of the Jews. Over the next couple of years, I was enthusiastic to learn – yet also confused. Truth to tell, quite disappointed.

I loved learning Jewish texts and ideas. But where were they in the liberal synagogues? They just weren't there – not the ideas, not the rituals, not the Hebrew, not even more than a faint smell of Peoplehood.

Many Reform rabbis were knowledgeable, pious and interesting. But the Judaism in Reform synagogues was emptied out, remedial and thin. The gap was disturbing, and because I was then actually thinking of becoming a rabbi, I was more than a bit beside myself.

Bewildered – this is the fall of 1979 now – I approached my teacher, Rabbi David Ellenson, then a newly minted professor of Jewish thought (later to become the president of Hebrew Union College).

"David," I remember asking more than a bit plaintively, "where is the 'there' there in Reform Judaism? I understand Reform and Conservative Judaism as effective strategies for keeping Jews within the fold. These movements, from the beginning, have understood that modernity causes the withering away of tradition – hence the liberal movements recognize that Jews need the help of synagogues in remaining Jewish. But I can't find the content in the liberal approaches. I hear the words – they're nice – but where are the ideas, the learning and the guts behind the words? Is Judaism just confined to a private pursuit that rabbis engage in and that's it?"

As he listened, Rabbi Ellenson at first frowned, and then as I concluded, he smiled. "You've named the problem exactly. Our way is more of a social strategy to keep Jews within the fold than it is a religious tradition.

Jews and Catholics: a pilgrimage to partnership

Rev. Damian MacPherson

Some will agree that Canadian Jews are more inclined to identify with Catholics when they refer to the body of believers referred to as Christians. Perhaps this is so for any number of reasons. One thinks, for example, of the church's involvement in the Crusades, the Inquisition, enforceable conversions, but especially the involvement of Catholics during the period of the Holocaust.

In times past, suspicion was a hallmark of the Catholic-Jewish relationship. Jews remember the long history of forcible conversions. Christians considered Judaism as an obstinate religion. In turn Jews – with historical justification – suspected that the Christian motivation for communication with them was aimed at conversion.

Thankfully, times change. At the grassroots level, it might be said that today, Catholics and Jews carry on a very civil relationship with one another. Today, tolerance and respect one for another can be found as Christians and Jews find themselves being neighbours and co-workers. Gratefully, deep and genuine friendships have developed between the two communities over the years.

But the truth is that, while relationships between Catholics and Jews have improved greatly, they need to continue to do so in the future. Happily, across Canada there are a number of Christian-Jewish dialogue groups who do their best to show the fruits of such dialogue encounters. Their collective voices give concrete expression to the mutual regard we must have for one another as Christians and Jews. This pilgrimage to deeper partnership can never again afford to be interrupted. Our synagogues and churches ought to see as obligatory the need to promote such progress.

In 1960, a noted French Jewish historian, Jules Isaac, presented Pope John XXIII with pertinent historical information on Christian anti-Judaism and certain attitudes that contributed to the Holocaust. This historic meeting is generally credited with being a major impetus for the pope's decision to direct Cardinal Augustin Bea, on Sept. 18, 1960, to draft a declaration on the Catholic Church's relationship to the Jewish People for the upcoming Second Vatican Council. This was the genesis of what would become the council document known as Nostra Aetate ("in our time"). In addressing the significances of all world religions, the document boldly declares that "the Church rejects nothing of what is true and holy in these religions." Further clarifying the Catholic Church's position, the document continues: "She has a high regard for the manner of life and conduct, the precepts and doctrines which, although differing in many ways from her own teaching, nevertheless often reflect a ray of that truth which enlightens all men."

Specifically, the document affirmed that "Jews should not be presented as rejected or accursed by God, as if this followed from the Holy Scriptures." It further declared that the church "decries hatred, persecutions, [and] displays of anti-Semitism, directed against Jews at any time and by anyone."

The document spends the greater portion of its time teaching and affirming the place and importance of the Jews, from whose validity Christians derive their identity.

Published on Oct. 28, 1965, this groundbreaking text is now celebrating its 50th anniversary. I dare to suggest that the average Catholic and Jew is unaware of the scope of this revolutionary document and thus the importance of the anniversary being celebrated.

Together we must praise God, because the darkness of night has passed and the dawning of a new day has arrived, offering sure hope for the continuing success of this emerging pilgrimage and partnership. Going forward, therefore, we are confident that, as it is written in Psalms 29:11, "The Lord will give strength to his people. The Lord will bless his people with peace." ■

Rev. Damian MacPherson, SA, is the director for ecumenical and interfaith affairs at the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto. The Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, in conjunction with the Archdiocese of Toronto, hosts a celebration commemorating the 50th anniversary of Nostra Aetate in Toronto on Oct. 8. Translating civic engagement into political engagement

Daniel Held

Voter turnout among young voters is abysmal. In the 2011 Canadian election, the turnout rate was 61.1 per cent. Among the youngest cohort of eligible voters, aged 18 to 24, it was 38.8 per cent, while among those 65 to 74 years old, it was 75.1 per cent. Political engagement, manifest through voter rates, is alarmingly low among young voters and, especially with an election on the horizon, we have an obligation to engage these voters in the political process.

Too often, however, political engagement is conflated with civil engagement. While they may not be voting, young people are engaged in their communities: volunteering, devoting time to building community, informing themselves on key social issues and taking action with passion and vigour.

The American National Civic Engagement Survey differentiates between two forms of public engagement: political engagement and civic engagement. Political engagement is activity aimed at influencing government policy or affecting the selection of public officials. Civic engagement, on the other hand, is participation aimed at achieving a public good through direct hands on work in co-operation with others.

The Jewish community has done a good job in mobilizing young adults toward civic engagement. We send youths to the developing world to build schools and dig wells; to Poland to learn about the Holocaust, racism and genocide; and to Israel to build the bonds of peoplehood. Our schools, camps and youth movements teach about tzedakah not only by raising money but by facilitating volunteer opportunities with local charities. We educate our youth about global issues of justice, the environment and poverty and particularistic issues including Israel and the fight against anti-Semitism.

We can be proud of our youths' high levels of civic engagement, as well as their passion and drive to contribute to their community and to better the world. But these high levels of civic engagement do not translate into political engagement. Here, we have a long way to go.

Too often, attempts to build political engagement are based on platitudes. We quote rabbinic leaders urging Jews to exercise their voting rights and have star musicians headline Rock the Vote concerts. It's not enough to talk about the importance of voting. Rather we must align political engagement with the values of civic engagement.

The first step is to explicitly demonstrate the link between the communal goals and aspirations so strongly developed through civic engagement and the results that can be netted through political engagement. Global development, fighting anti-Semitism, alleviating poverty, saving the environment and supporting Israel cannot be achieved through civic engagement alone, but only through a partnership of civic engagement and political action. For youths to see that the issues of concern to them are political issues can play a role in growing political engagement.

The second step is for us to make political engagement a regular part of our lives. Too often, we measure political engagement only through voter turnout on election day. Political engagement must run deeper. It can be manifest by following political trends, engaging in conversation with family and peers, and advocating for issues. Through recent campaigns, the Jewish community has helped place volunteers to work on campaigns, supporting candidates beyond the ballot box.

If political action is seen as a regular part of our work to bring about change in our community and our world, as something that happens not only when an election has been called, but as part of our commitment to the issues that are important to us, we can raise electoral turnout rates

My vote will be counted on Oct. 19, not only because I believe in the importance of exercising a right that has not always been offered to my ancestors, but because I believe it's one small way of bringing about the kinds of change I want to see in the world. ■

Beginnings, endings and an election

Jean M. Gerber

This column will appear as the season of holidays draws to a close and the October election date looms in Canada. It also appears the week we begin our Torah readings again, literally from the beginning, with Bereshit.

Is there a connection? Let's see.

We have just spent weeks examining our own lives, trying to make amends to those we have injured, pledging to be better this coming year than we were last year, and celebrating the receiving of the Torah at Mount Sinai.

Now we will again begin the study of our Foundation Text. In Bereshit (one version of the creation of mankind), God forms man from the earth's dust and breathes "nishmat chaim" into God's creation. Thus, the new creature becomes "a living soul."

Just a living soul, not an Israelite or Jewish one.

This week I will chant the Haftorah for Bereshit. I learn that we, the people of Israel, are to be a "light to the nations," and one of our principle duties is "to rescue prisoners from confinement... those who sit in darkness."

I think I have found a connection among these three things: beginnings, endings (of the holidays) and elections.

Beginnings. We have been challenged these past weeks by pictures of desperate people trying to escape war and devastation in their home countries. They seek a beginning. Thousands have died for this hope, while others continue to push forward. We should not be surprised that, finally, the misrule and murder in those countries have caused the bravest of their people to try for something better – as did the Jews of Canada whose families came from similarly war-torn, economically ravished countries before and after World War II.

What beginnings they faced, what challenges, in a Canada not friendly to their plight. Neither prewar immigrants nor survivors found a Canada welcoming them. Just try substituting "Jew" for this current wave of refugees (mostly Muslim) and you will find a familiar refrain. Ironically, Germany, once the author of our destruction, has come forward with help.

Elections. We have a chance to tell the next government how we feel about Canada's responsibilities to welcome another population, which, if the past is any standard, will greatly benefit our country. When Jews tried to enter Canada, whether before the war, after the war, or from Hungary in 1956, they were often assumed to be "unassimilable."

Jews were too poor, or too rich, or too dirty, or not-quite-white, or communists (shudder). Face it, just not Christian.

Let's recall that both stories of creation never identify the nationality or religion of the first people. And the accompanying Haftorah delegates, no, it commands us, to rescue prisoners from confinement, those who dwell in darkness. Our reluctance to demand that our government, whoever it will be, should move expeditiously to rescue more than a few, shows us to have assimilated the worst aspects of Canada, not led with our own best ones.

Endings. The holidays are over, and we should take leave of them with a sigh.

But otherwise, who knows the endings? I am not a strong believer in inevitable endings such as "this will end in tears." Maybe it will end in rejoicings, like the reapers in the psalm.

I will hope for some things to end. I will hope that (see above, for my opinion on receiving immigrants from the Middle East) when those who were taught to hate us learn about Canada and about our own community, they will learn to not hate or fear us. They will see us as sharing their hopes and dreams for a good ending to their struggles.

They certainly will not un-learn their hatred and fear in squalid refugee camps where they are prey to ISIS recruiters or propaganda blaming their suffering on Israel/Jews. Surely we could try to make their ending one of joy. ■

What's Russia up to in Syria?

Paul Michaels

It's rare to find the U.S. media virtually united in their criticism of President Barack Obama's Middle East policy but, following Obama's speech to the UN General Assembly on Sept. 28 and his meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin, that was indeed the case.

Specifically, the criticism was aimed at Obama's lack of a coherent plan for Syria (and Iraq) as Putin runs circles around him by building up Russian military might there and extending his influence into the wider region at the expense of the Americans.

New York Times editorials often appear to be conduits for the Obama administration (see the paper's comments on the Iran nuclear deal). Yet, regarding Syria and what Putin is up to, even the Times expressed, however mildly, skepticism about Obama's new call at the UN for "managed transition," in co-operation with Syria, Russia and Iran, away from Syrian President Bashar Assad to a new "more inclusive" government.

"But there is little reason to believe that any compromise between the Assad government and the opposition fighters, or Washington and Moscow, will happen soon," the Times wrote. Even more to the point, while the Times acknowledged that Obama didn't create the "catastrophe" that Syria has become it complained that Obama, while excoriating Assad for the carnage he's created, "doesn't have the answer" to change anything on the ground.

The Times also noted that the Obama administration was caught "flatfooted" twice recently, taken surprise first by Putin's rapid deployment of tanks and jet fighters (there are also reports of Russian troops) to Syria; then by the announcement that Russia will be co-ordinating sharing intelligence with Syria, Iraq and Iran.

Making the same points, only more bluntly, the Washington Post argued that "Mr. Obama lacks any strategy to back up [his] vision [of a stable, democratic Syria] or to counter Mr. Putin, who is backing his words with a show of military 'hard power' and a flurry of alliance-building in Syria, Iraq and Iran."

The Post also faulted Obama for having failed several years ago, when this might have been feasible, "to lend timely, effective support to Syria's rebellion before extremists took it over." Now it's far too late. There is little to choose between Assad, responsible for 250,000 dead Syrians and the displacement of 11 million others – half the country's population – and ISIS, which has killed far fewer, but whose barbarity, and plans for a great deal more, may exceed even Assad's.

Ideas are scant for finding a replacement for Assad, given the hold his extensive Alawite clan has in the Syrian "government," which Putin is sworn to protect and which Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and Iran's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, view as a guarantee of their continuing dominance there. No wonder they're thrilled with Russia's new muscular approach, which buffets their own.

Israel, of course, remains worried about what these developments mean for its own security, especially on the Golan Heights, where Iran and its proxy force, Hezbollah, appear determined to entrench themselves in their campaign against the Jewish state.

It's not a surprise that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the chief of the IDF and the head of military intelligence flew to Moscow for a meeting with Putin to establish ground rules for the IDF's own operations in Syria to counter these mounting threats, including trying to keep advanced Iranian weapons out of Hezbollah's hands. Netanyahu reportedly came away with some assurances.

Ron Ben-Yishai, the respected military analyst for Yediot Achronot, said late last month, with partial optimism, that "Russia will probably serve as a stabilizing force in Syria, but what's less appealing is that it will legitimize an Iranian entrance into the country, under its supervision." Ben-Yishai was quick to add, however, that "it's unknown what will come out of the complex regional stew Russia is cooking."

Uncertainty, instability and complex speculative scenarios remain the order of the day. ■

Event to mark 50 years of improved Catholic-Jewish ties

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jews, Christians and Muslims will gather at the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College Oct. 8 to celebrate the legacy of a Vatican document that intended to radically revise the Catholic Church's relations with other religions.

It's been 50 years since the proclamation of Nostra Aetate ("In Our Time"), which daringly reached out to non-Christian faiths, particularly Jews.

It was, essentially, the church's first positive statement about Judaism, and it changed the nature of Catholic-Jewish relations, for it not only recognized the validity of Mosaic law from which Christianity sprang, but it finally absolved Jews, past and present, of the charge they killed Jesus.

The day-long conference, titled "Responsibility to Engage," will feature several Jewish participants, including former senator Hugh Segal, now master of Massey College, and Rabbi Ron Kronish, founding director of the Interreligious Co-ordinating Council in Israel, who will address a lunchtime session on "A Jewish Response to 50 years of the Dialogue since Nostra Aetate: The Way Forward."

Also slated to speak is Edward Kessler, founder director of the Woolf Institute and a fellow of St. Edmund's College, Cambridge. He is a leading thinker in Jewish-Christian-Muslim relations.

There will also be an evening program and four breakout sessions on economics, the environment, politics and culture, including a panel moderated by lawyer Mark Freiman, the last president of the Canadian Jewish Congress. Among the sponsors is the Toronto Board of Rabbis. About 200 people are expected.

Hugh Segal

Rabbi Ron Kronish

Three years in the planning, the program will celebrate the document's legacy of engagement, said conference chair Barbara Boraks, executive director of Christian Jewish Dialogue of Toronto.

The "whole premise of the document was the concept of engagement," Boraks told The CJN. "So we're taking the idea of engagement and applying [it] in a broader way in society."

Indeed, one of the sessions will explore how religion can have a positive impact on social and public policy.

Boraks pointed to Pope Francis's recent swing through the United States, in which the pontiff spoke of the "productive and human way to deal with social issues. We need to focus on ideas and people, not on ideology, and we need to engage with one another in a manner that facilitates dialogue and not polarity or debate," she said.

"So we tried to create a conference that celebrates the document by engaging our audience in a manner that not just talks about what engagement can do, but can show them what it can do."

An outgrowth of the liberalizing Second Vatican Council (1962-1965), Nostra Aetate was just 1,600 words long, but it packed a game-changing punch.

Proclaimed by Pope Paul VI on Oct. 28, 1965, it spoke warmly of Buddhists and Hindus ("the Catholic Church rejects nothing that is true and holy in these religions," it stated) and Muslims ("they adore the one God.")

But it saved its best for Jews, which it referred to as "Abraham's stock."

It said the crucifixion "cannot be charged against all the Jews... then alive, nor against the Jews of today," and that Jews "should not be presented as rejected or accursed by God.

It also decried "hatred, persecutions [and] displays of anti-Semitism, directed against Jews at any time and by anyone."

The document "made a major difference in [interfaith] relations, in trying to understand one another," said Rabbi David Seed of Adath Israel Congregation, a member of the conference's steering committee.

Fifty years on, the statement, which was adopted by the church's bishops by a vote of 2,221 to 88, was "prescient in terms of the need for this type of dialogue." Today, "we see how important it is to continue on in that way, and do more," Rabbi Seed said.

Going forward, the next big challenge for all mainstream religions is the rise of fundamentalism in all faiths, not just Islam, he stressed.

Fundamentalism "doesn't wipe out gains that have taken place with Nostra Aetate but that only makes us work harder so that we understand the importance, even more so, to continue that dialogue and respect and understanding." ■

Montreal Reconstructionist shul opposes interfaith rabbis

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Montreal's Congregation Dorshei Emet, one of Canada's three Reconstructionist congregations, opposes the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College's (RRC) Sept. 30 decision to revoke its "non-Jewish partner" policy.

The policy stipulated that a Jew married to, or in a committed relationship with, a non-Jewish partner wasn't permitted to enter or graduate from the rabbinical school.

"I think rabbis need to model maximal Jewish living and not model what's on the rise – mixed marriages," Dorshei Emet's Rabbi Ron Aigen said.

The RRC consulted his synagogue board last year, he explained, when both he and the board expressed their resistance to removing the ban that prevented the ordination of intermarried rabbis.

While his congregation hasn't made any decisions about whether to continue its affiliation with the college, Rabbi Aigen stressed, "We're not happy with the situation." He argued that allowing rabbis to intermarry promotes the practice and sends the message that conversion of non-Jewish partners needn't be considered.

While rabbis should support interfaith couples striving to raise Jewish children, he said, "for a rabbi to take that route [of intermarrying], to me seems wrong."

In a Sept. 30 statement, the Philadelphia-based RRC – the movement's only seminary – announced the revocation of the ban, after a faculty vote Sept. 21. It said the movement believes the boundaries of Judaism are "porous and constantly evolving" and that the Jewish future depends on "shifting focus toward Jews 'doing Jewish' in ways that are meaningful to them rather than on 'being Jewish' because of bloodline or adherence to mandated behaviours.'"

In a media conference call Sept. 30, RRC president Rabbi Deborah Waxman said faculty reached the decision after an extensive, two-year consultation process with RRC students and alumni, as well as with leadership from congregations across North America. The exact results of the vote are confidential, she said.

Rabbi Waxman said the RRC doesn't believe it's the job of rabbis to "police boundaries" and that the change will potentially expand the number of "passionate, excited, creative Jewish leaders" and increase the number of rabbis who can model what it means to create a Jewish home in a mixed-faith household.

Intermarriage is prevalent in the United States, she said, yet "there are interfaith families living wonderfully rich Jewish lives and making beautiful Jewish homes. We can work with them and help raise them to the highest level of leadership."

Rabbi Deborah Waxman

Rabbi Aigen said he disagrees that two partners can have completely separate spiritual identities, arguing this contradicts the value of Judaism being a "family affair."

"Judaism is about creating unified family identity – not one that's [necessarily] racial or biological, but one you can join, if you want."

He stressed that Dorshei Emet welcomes people in mixed marriages to the congregation and encourages their participation in synagogue life, however, "ritually, there are certain limitations [on non-Jewish participants] in terms of what they can do in synagogue. Those limitations are part of them saying, 'I'm not Jewish and I don't want to become Jewish formally.' But you can't say, 'I don't want to be Jewish, but I want to be treated like a Jew and given all the rights and privileges of Jewish life.'"

Rabbi Tina Grimberg of Toronto's Reconstructionist Congregation Darchei Noam, wouldn't comment on the new policy, but said she expressed her views on the subject in a piece for The CJN last May on whether rabbis should be permitted to intermarry.

In discussing the issue's complexity, Grimberg challenged the notion that "intercoupled" rabbis are more likely to help integrate interfaith couples into the Jewish world. Rather, she wrote, "empathy, understanding, real engagement in people's lives... is what fosters integration."

She concluded that while there's evidence children of interfaith couples can and do live Jewishly, ordaining intermarried rabbis isn't the way to accomplish such integration. "The Jewish life of a rabbi has never been meant to be a mirror for his or her community," she wrote.

Rabbi Elizabeth Bolton of Or Haneshamah, Ottawa's Reconstructionist congregation, said the decision is a positive change.

Rabbi Waxman said that the RRC, which typically graduates between eight and 10 rabbis each year, has previously turned away potential students who would otherwise make "wonderful rabbis." ■

Fashion trailblazer remembered for his unique talents

jshupac@thecjn.ca

A man of immense talents, dynamism and passion, clothier Alan Cherry was, as his sister Joy put it, an "unusual force in the city."

Descended from a family of retailers dating back to the early 1900s, Cherry firmly established himself as a fashion icon in his own right, a reputation he upheld even after he left the industry in 2006 due to illness.

Cherry died Sept. 21 at the age of 80.

His high-end Yonge Street clothing store, called Alan Cherry, which he took over from his parents in 1970, became an institution in the city, legendary for its bridal wear and for being one of the first to bring designer European labels such as Hugo Boss and Versace to Toronto.

Cherry prevailed in the fashion industry through the 1970s and '80s and subsequently opened a women's clothing store in Yorkville, where he worked until his health declined.

He was known for his impeccable taste and distinctive branding.

"You'd get a gold cherry tree inside your garment – it was under the [item's] label," remembered Wendy Mandelbaum, one of Cherry's three daughters.

Along with impeccable taste and business savvy, Cherry had trademark theatrical flair: he famously garnered attention for posing with a tiger for an ad, and in 1978, he made news for showing his wares to two dozen or so visiting Saudi Arabian princesses.

"He raised the bar of retail in Toronto beyond the grand retail legacy he was born into," Wendy said.

Cherry's grandparents immigrated from Russia to Toronto in 1906 and opened up a dry cleaning and tailoring business. The store later expanded to carry ladies' wear.

His mother subsequently continued the family clothing legacy, opening a clothing store on Danforth Avenue.

He grew up in the apartment above it, the middle child between sisters Linda and Joy, who also became clothing retailers, each with a store to their names.

Cherry attended Lawrence Park Collegiate and, according to his family, excelled in both artistic and athletic endeavours. He played hockey and worked as a lifeguard, and as a teen, won a sculpture contest sponsored by Eaton's department store.

"He had all this creativity that he put into his business," Wendy said.

When he was a young man, Cherry worked in his mother's store and showed keen interest in the industry. He eventually split off and launched his flagship store, on Yonge just south of Bloor Street.

"My brother will never be replicated. There isn't another human being that could be like him," said Joy, herself a former retailer of international high fashion. "With his creativity, retailing, athleticism – he was really an incredible man."

Cherry had three daughters with his first wife Rosalyn.

He was a competitive squash player with many awards to his name, and in 1980, he was Canada's No. 2-ranked player. Wendy said it was always important to Cherry to remain affiliated with the Young Men's Hebrew Association, even after he began to be invited to non-Jewish athletics clubs. "He was one of the first Jewish people [in the city] to be invited into non-Jewish clubs, and he set a precedent for that," she said.

Bob Saunderson, chair of the Bloor Street Business Improvement Area and a commercial real estate broker, said he always respected Cherry for his commitment to running his business on his own terms.

In the 1960s, he said, Cherry's store ranked among Creeds, a high-end furrier, and Holt Renfrew as the city's leading fashion retailers.

"He was one of the best merchants in the city, and I'd think even in Canada, at that time," Saunderson noted.

Saunderson said he was "forever trying to get Alan Cherry to move [his store] into a shopping centre," but "[Cherry] was a 'Main Street' retailer and he perfected that… He was very good at it and you couldn't argue with it."He praised Cherry for being "a perfectionist, always elegant" and "always fun to deal with."

Cherry was a survivor of lymphoma and, later, a stroke, but succumbed to a brief bout of pneumonia. He's survived by daughters Lisa, Wendy and Debbie and grandchildren Arin, Lauren, Lucas and Jake. ■

Montrealers' satirical site exposes political blunders

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Despite the humble online presence it's had for the past two years, The True North Times, the brainchild of three precocious Montrealers, two of whom are Jewish, has surged in popularity after breaking the story of Hamilton federal NDP candidate Alex Johnstone's 2008 Facebook comment referencing the "phallic" appearance of electric fence posts at Auschwitz and former B.C. Liberal candidate Cheryl Thomas' anti-Muslim and anti-Jewish comments.

The Canadian political humour site's original article about Johnstone was published Sept. 22 as part of a special election series featuring blunders by candidates from Canada's leading political parties.

True North's editor-in-chief and chief operating officer, Max Seltzer, 21, said his team sent the piece to the Hamilton Spectator, which subsequently interviewed Johnstone and reported her now infamous "I didn't know what Auschwitz was" response to a question about her original post.

The story, and news of Johnstone temporarily stepping down from her role as vice-chair of the Hamilton-Wenworth District School Board, quickly went viral nationally, and The True North Times was widely credited with first reporting it.

Seltzer told The CJN that he and his colleagues have since been interviewed by outlets such as the CBC, Global News, CTV News and the Guardian.

On Sept. 30, True North exposed Thomas' reference on Facebook to mosques as "brainwashing stations" and remark that "the oppressed of the Warsaw ghettos and concentration camps have become the oppressors [in Israel-Palestine]."

"It's been a wild ride thus far," Seltzer said of the media attention.

In November 2013, True North's president and CEO Simren Sandhu, now a 19-year-old third-year McGill student, along with chief marketing and strategy officer Daniel Etcovitch, a McGill graduate who just entered his first year at Harvard Law School, and Seltzer, a fourth-year student at McGill, seized on what they saw as a gap in the market for Canadian political satire.

They launched the site with a mandate to combat political apathy and make Canadian politics accessible and funny.

"We use [former Daily Show host's] Jon Stewart style of satire: taking real content and news and putting a little bit of a spin on it… making it funny, engaging and worth reading about," Etcovitch, 22, explained.

With a team of a dozen or so freelance contributors who write in a volunteer capacity, True North publishes fresh content daily and bills itself as non-partisan.

Its model includes analysis, opinion articles and features, as well as more creative content such as "The Nine Days of Scandal" election series, which exposed the gaffes of Johnstone and eight other candidates from different parties.

The list also included Stefan Jonasson, the NDP candidate for Manitoba's Charleswood-St. James-Assiniboia-Headingley riding, who compared haredim to the Taliban on Twitter, and Benjamin Dichter, the Toronto-Danforth Conservative candidate who posted a video on Facebook with the subtitle "Moslems and scums destroying everything in a area in Paris France."

Etcovitch stressed that True North has a mandate to showcase diverse opinions and "make fun of all parties equally."

He noted that the site has never called for a candidate to resign, but is just "giving the public information we think they should have."

As for True North's track record in unearthing social media slip-ups, Seltzer said the team has a knack for investigative journalism and has put significant effort into digging through Elections Canada records, filing freedom of information requests and scrolling through politicians' Facebook and Twitter pages.

"Most people don't do a lot of research on their local candidates. We started doing it ourselves and were shocked at what we found… We quickly realized that [our election coverage] was going to be focused on, 'Can you believe what your local candidate said?'" Etcovitch said.

The site, which he said doesn't take much money to operate and is mostly funded through advertising, targets young Canadians.

Etcovitch attributes youth apathy to the fact many young people don't feel their vote makes a difference, as well as because Canada's political system doesn't allow for direct voting for prime minister and youth activism isn't featured in the media.

"We don't hear the issues young people care about and they're not lobbying because they don't care about [issues] in the first place. It's a vicious cycle," he said.

Seltzer emphasized that he and his colleagues at True North have enjoyed the recent attention, but will be getting back to their "bread and butter: making politics interesting." ■

A story in our Oct. 1 edition headlined "Court dismisses defamation suit by Canadian Union of Postal Workers" incorrectly stated that Sun News and the Toronto Sun issued apologies and retractions to CUPW for suggesting the postal union or its members were sympathetic to Hamas or supporters of terrorism.

The retractions cited in our story were requested by CUPW and referenced in a decision by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. Sun News and the Toronto Sun did not issue the requested retractions. The CJN regrets the error. ■

Israel once again contentious for Mount Royal candidates

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Justin Trudeau does not share his brother's views on the Middle East and is not being advised by him, says Anthony Housefather, the Liberal candidate in Mount Royal.

In response to an audience question at a panel discussion among the riding's major party candidates, held by Bialik High School Sept. 30, Housefather attempted to dispel a recurring claim that the Liberal leader is under the sway of his brother Alexandre (Sacha) Trudeau, a documentary filmmaker.

The younger Trudeau's strongly political films offer a point of view on the Middle East not entirely compatible with the Liberal party's and certainly not with that of those with strong convictions about Israel. His most recent production was the 2012 The New Great Game: The Decline of the West & The Struggle for Middle Eastern Oil.

"Justin Trudeau has publicly said he disagrees with his brother and that he is not his adviser or playing any role in this campaign," Housefather said. The question, like all the others that evening, was submitted in writing anonymously.

The assertion that Alexandre Trudeau is influencing his brother is being made in the open as well. At a public event the week before in support of Mount Royal Conservative candidate Robert Libman and featuring former foreign affairs minister John Baird, a woman in the audience wanted to know why the alleged role of Alexandre Trudeau in the campaign was not being addressed. Neither Libman nor Baird directly commented.

At the Bialik meeting, Housefather said he is "disturbed" by "anonymous emails circulating in this riding that make false allegations... Why would his brother's views reflect on him? It doesn't make sense."

Close to 200 people, many of them students, attended the discussion among Housefather, Libman and NDP candidate Mario Jacinto Rimbao, moderated by principal Avi Satov. Students submitted six of the questions posed to them, and the rest came from the audience. One from the latter was on the difference on Israel between Trudeau and Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Libman said that Trudeau's comments that Canada's "reputation on the international stage has been tarnished... and we should return to a more nuanced approach as an honest broker can be decoded as it's time to water down [support for Israel] in order to get along with the dictators at the UN."

Libman also criticized Trudeau's acceptance of the candidacy of Andrew Leslie in the Ottawa area riding of Orléans, because the retired general last year accused Israel of "firing indiscriminately onto Palestinian women and children" during the war in Gaza. Libman said Trudeau is being advised by Leslie on foreign affairs.

Housefather responded that Trudeau's "mentor" on Israel is outgoing Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, who was in attendance, and that his staff adviser is Marci Surkes, a Jewish woman from the riding.

"As Justin Trudeau said during the [Sept. 28] Munk [foreign policy] debate, Israel should not be used as a wedge issue for the Jewish community," said Housefather, who insisted there's no essential difference between the Liberals and Conservatives on Israel, and that his party is guided by principle. He cited public stands Trudeau has taken, such as on the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel. "We all know the Muslim vote is greater than the Jewish vote, so why would he say that if he did not truly believe it? As for myself, I have an impeccable record on support for Israel."

Rimbao said he's sensitive to how Israel is an emotional issue for Jews, but the NDP believes Canada "should get back to its reputation for leadership in peace brokerage." ■

Thornhill candidates face off on Jewish issues

sshefa@thecjn.ca

At an all-party debate for Thornhill candidates, Conservative incumbent Peter Kent, Liberal candidate Nancy Coldham and NDP candidate Lorne Cherry addressed issues important to the Jewish community, including the economy, Canada's relationship with Israel, Iran's nuclear deal and the rise in anti-Semitism and terrorism.

The Sept. 30 event, sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada and held at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, attracted more than 200 people who gathered to hear from the candidates in advance of the Oct. 19 federal election.

Kent, who has represented Thornhill riding since 2008, began by touting Canada's economy, and boasted that it "emerged from the recession the envy of the G7 countries... Despite opposition attempts recently to talk down the economy and talk up tax hikes, this country is in growth."

But Coldham, a small business entrepreneur, challenged Kent's "mistaken view that we have a booming economy," adding that Canada has "the worst economy in 80 years."

Defending the Liberal fiscal plan that would see a deficit of about $10 billion for each of the first three years and then a balanced budget by the 2019-2020 fiscal year, Coldham said, "A significant infrastructure investment has been proven time and time again... to be the most efficient and impactful way that a government can stimulate the economy."

Cherry, also a small business entrepreneur, said Canadians "need a government that looks after 100 per cent of its population, not the top eight per cent."

He also challenged Kent's claim that Canada is the envy of G7 countries.

"The U.S. was in way worse shape than us, but now, our dollar is worth 75 cents to theirs."

Speaking about the BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) movement, Kent called it a "thinly disguised, multi-dimensional hate campaign" that targets the only democracy in the Middle East.

He said the BDS movement on campus is disruptive to students and his party has proposed a bill that would condemn the BDS movement and call on administrators of publicly funded universities to "take real and firm action against all forms of hate speech."

Coldham said the BDS movement is "un-Canadian and unacceptable," but added that she is "annoyed" by the misconception that the Conservative party is the only one that supports Israel.

She said there is a "lack of a clear position and framework for a strong Middle East policy and that would do a lot to help, not just the security issue, but collectively make sure that Israel is safe in this world."

Cherry said the BDS movement "is a touchy issue." He also addressed the misconception that the Conservatives alone stand with Israel, but said that the NDP takes a more "pragmatic" and non-hypocritical" stance.

Speaking about the rise of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada and abroad, as well as terrorism on Canadian soil, Cherry said "the only way we are going to combat anti-Semitism, hatred, discrimination, marginalization and sexual discrimination is through education, and education comes through dialogue.

"I myself, I have to admit, I was embarrassed when one of our candidates did not understand that Auschwitz was tied to the Holocaust. That is an education issue."

Coldham said addressing the issue takes much more than education and dialogue.

"I think we need a strong legislative framework," she said, and referred to retiring Liberal MP Irwin Cotler's Ottawa Protocol on Combating Antisemitism, an action plan that was developed in 2010 and received all-party support.

Speaking about the recent nuclear weapons agreement with Iran signed by the P5+1 nations, Coldham said, "This has been a weakness for the Harper government. Canada, yet again, had no say, and is not a player in the negotiations."

Kent said the Conservative government has long maintained that Canada will judge Iran on its actions rather than words and contradictory slogans.

He said U.S. President Barack Obama should have continued with the strategy of tightened sanctions and aggressive diplomacy because "they were working... But European greed in some quarters, new trade deals with Iran, and I believe, President Obama's fixation on a legacy deal in his lame duck year, has simply postponed an eventual crisis. President Obama has effectively... punted the crisis to his successor and the world." ■

Candidates clash in lively York Centre tilt

It was a raucous night Oct. 1 at Adath Israel Congregation, where the federal candidates in York Centre riding squared off in a spirited debate.

Most of the two-hour affair, during which the audience had to be admonished several times to keep a civil tone, centred on Israel, anti-Semitism and terrorism. The evening was sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada.

Green party candidate Constantine Kritsonis touched off controversy early when he declared that Israel's incursion into Gaza last year "went too far." That earned boos and jeers, and a lecture to the crowd from moderator Marvin Kurz on democracy and freedom of speech.

Kritsonis called the Middle East "a complicated matter" and said Parliament should not be "a vehicle for a proxy war. We need to be neutral to be a peace broker."

He said the Green party does not endorse the boycott, sanctions and divestment (BDS) movement and he called on Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to cease all settlement expansion.

Incumbent MP Mark Adler said his Conservative party "is very proud of its record" on Israel. To applause and cheers, he repeated Prime Minister Stephen Harper's 2014 remarks to Israel's Knesset: "Through fire and water, Canada will stand with you."

Adler said his party has never had to dismiss a candidate for anti-Jewish or anti-Israel views – referring to the NDP's and Liberals' recent dropping of candidates who made controversial online postings – and has "never" voted against Israel at the United Nations.

He called the BDS movement "anti-Semitism, plain and simple," and said his government "will not tolerate it for one second."

Liberal candidate Michael Levitt touted his bona fides as a founding board member of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) and said "many things will change" under a Liberal government, "but one thing will not: we will always stand firmly in our support for Israel."

Support for Israel "is a Canadian value, not a Conservative value," Levitt said, and said Israel "should not be a wedge issue" in the election.

NDP hopeful Hal Berman, a palliative care physician, also said he rejects BDS — "not more or not less" than the Conservatives. He said criticism of Israel is not always anti-Semitic, and, in a barb directed at Adler, said claiming to be the son of a Holocaust survivor, as Adler had done on his campaign material until he changed it, "does not give you credibility."

Levitt also took a shot at the incumbent, saying Adler's now infamous remarks at the Western Wall, where he asked to be included in a photograph with Harper because it was "a million-dollar shot," turned "what should have been a proud moment into an embarrassment."

He earned cheers and boos when he said the Tories "have pitted Jew against Jew."

Adler struck back, saying "what is really embarrassing and shameful" are Liberal candidates such as Omar Alghabra, a former MP now running in Mississauga and a former president of the Canadian Arab Federation, a group the Tories defunded for allegedly supporting terrorist organizations.

Adler said "a balanced position" on the Middle East "is really code, and we won't stand for it."

Berman said a "monopoly on righteousness does not belong to the Conservatives." At one point, he lashed out at partisan audience members, saying he knows "six-year-olds who are better behaved."

Turning to Iran, Berman said the NDP will not condemn the nuclear deal reached with that country and, quoting former U.S. President Ronald Reagan, would pursue a policy of "trust but verify."

Adler slammed Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau for saying Canada will re-establish relations with Iran, "the largest state sponsor of terror in the world." Later, Adler said Canada must fight terrorism because "it is here," referring to last year's gun attack inside Parliament's Centre Block. "We're all Israelis now. That's what I told the prime minister."

On the anti-terrorist Bill C-51, Berman said the Tories "are trying to scare us into giving up our rights." He said an NDP government would ensure both security and the maintenance of rights. "We can have both."

Levitt said it was a Liberal government that enacted anti-terror laws after the 9/11 attacks. ■

Parties court Jewish vote in Winnipeg South Centre

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Jim Carr

Joyce Bateman

It looks increasingly like the riding of Winnipeg South Centre – the Winnipeg riding with the largest number of Jewish voters – will once again have a Jewish Liberal representative in Ottawa after a four-year hiatus.

The riding had been represented for 11 years by Liberal MP Anita Neville, who was defeated in 2011 by former school trustee Joyce Bateman, running for the Tories. This time around, Bateman is in trouble, with polls showing Liberal Jim Carr, a Jewish former Liberal MLA, polling at close to 50 per cent support and Bateman trailing with about half that.

Bateman didn't necessarily help her case Sept. 30 when she appeared at a B'nai Brith Canada debate at the Asper Community Campus, along with Carr, NDP candidate Matt Henderson and Green candidate Andrew Park.

While Carr spoke about his life-long commitment to the Liberals and shared some of his experiences canvassing voters, Bateman drew loud groans for alleging the Liberals embrace terrorism and louder groans and cries of "Shame" for using her concluding remarks to mention Liberal candidates elsewhere who have been vocally anti-Israel or soft on Muslim extremism.

The debate consisted of five questions from moderator Dan Lett, a Winnipeg Free Press political columnist. The candidates each had two minutes to answer and one minute for rebuttal after all had responded. Responding to a question about Israel and the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement, Park, an associate professor of ecology at the University of Winnipeg, slammed Israel for settlement expansion, called on Israel and Egypt to lift their blockade of Gaza and questioned the viability of the two-state solution.

He did note that the Green party doesn't support BDS, but is strongly in favour of free speech.

"We affirm the inviolable right of Israel to exist," he said "But that doesn't mean we subscribe to [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper's view that somehow Israel among all nations is immune to criticism."

Bateman spoke of the Harper government's strong support of Israel and forcefully condemned anti-Semitism, saying Israel is held to higher standards than other countries.

"Our government will always oppose the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement," she said. "We will also always oppose anti-Semitism, which is what BDS is really all about, just as we will oppose any attempt to delegitimize Israel, who is a friend and ally and… the only democracy in the Middle East."

Henderson said the NDP recognizes Israel's right to defend itself and suggested that at the local level, the community should get together with BDS proponents to determine the root causes behind the movement and try to find a solution.

"[NDP Leader] Tom Mulcair has come out clearly and used the words that the BDS movement is grossly unacceptable," Henderson said. "The NDP is a friend of Israel. We believe absolutely that Israel has the right to defend itself and that we need to maintain trade relations with the only democracy in the Middle East."

Carr spoke of the long history of anti-Semitism, noting his grandparents and great-grandparents came to Canada more than 100 years ago to escape it in Russia. "That is why for me Israel must always be a Jewish state. BDS is a new manifestation of anti-Semitism and we oppose it."

The rebuttal phase centred around Canada working with the UN for peace in the Middle East. Carr pointed out Canada's isolation on the world stage vis-à-vis Israel, pledging that Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau would work through the UN, but would never accept any resolutions calling for a boycott of Israel.

The second question concerned the Iran nuclear deal. Bateman outlined the Iranian regime's crimes against humanity and the Harper government's principled stands against dealing with Iran.

Henderson said the NDP believes that peace is better than war and Canada needs to reopen its embassy in Tehran to be able to monitor Iran to ensure it abides by the terms of the recent nuclear deal.

Carr said the chances of influencing Iran are better if Canada is talking to the regime, while Park said he thinks it's a mistake for Canada not to have diplomatic relations with Iran and sees potential for it to be an ally in fighting ISIS.

Another question about the government's anti-terror Bill C-51 drew the expected responses, with Park opposing the legislation, Bateman defending it and Carr saying a Trudeau government would amend it. ■

CAMPAIGN NOTEBOOK

Munk Debate glosses over Israel. Is that a good thing?

Daniel Wolgelerenter

Is that all there was? Given how much praise – and criticism – the Harper government's strong support for Israel has attracted, it's somewhat surprising that so little was said about the Jewish state in the Sept. 28 Munk Debate on foreign policy in Toronto.

The night's only exchange on Israel, between Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, came more than halfway through the proceedings, when Harper raised the topic, ostensibly in response to comments by NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair about working with allies on issues of global concern, such as Iran.

"I fully admit that we don't always take the position of our allies. Sometimes we take our positions based on what we believe are principles," Harper said.

"Let me give you a clear example. This government has been perhaps the most unequivocal in the world on the fact that when it comes to the Middle East, we are not going to single out Israel. It is the one western democratic ally. Threats that are... directed at that state – [it's] on the front line of threats directed against us. We are not going to single out the Jewish state for attack and criticism. We recognize unequivocally the right of Israel to be a Jewish state and to defend itself."

After applause, moderator Rudyard Griffiths asked Trudeau to respond.

"The issue of Israel where we most disagree as Liberals with Mr. Harper is that he has made support for Israel a domestic political football, when all three of us support Israel, and any Canadian government will," he said, also to applause.

And that was it – boilerplate statement against boilerplate statement. Given how support for the Jewish state has become so unnecessarily partisan, the relative quiet was refreshing.

That's probably a good thing.

Other "Jewish" issues figured prominently, with robust discussions on refugees and citizenship, for example.

Regarding the latter, Harper bragged about having revoked the citizenship of a convicted terrorist, while Trudeau countered that the Tories have created a "two-tiered" system and that "you devalue the citizenship of every Canadian... when you break down and make it conditional for anybody."

There's still time: Though there's only a week and half until the election, it's not too late to volunteer for the party or candidate of your choice.

Throughout the campaign, the Canadian Jewish Public Affairs Committee, (CJPAC) – whose mandate is "to engage Jewish and pro-Israel Canadians in the democratic process and to foster active political participation" – has been holding volunteer training workshops in various locations in the Golden Horseshoe, as well as information events in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal. Final workshops, aimed at demystifying the volunteering process, are scheduled for Oct. 8 at Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton, as well as Oct. 13 at Beth Tzedec Congregation and Oct. 14 at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in the GTA.

The non-partisan CJPAC placed 900 volunteers in the 2011 federal election. Its officials say they don't track gender and ages – they will only say that the highest numbers came from Ontario, home to two-thirds of Canadian Jews – and they refuse, somewhat understandably, to disclose volunteers' party affiliations. All they'll say about the current campaign is that they're on track to place similar numbers with all the major parties.

On that score, it bears emphasizing that Jews should volunteer for the party in which they feel most comfortable. All the major parties support Israel, and none are in complete lockstep with "Jewish values," which are open to relatively wide interpretation. Furthermore, potential volunteers should not be intimidated by the current polarized atmosphere in the Jewish community, where some people are trying, unfortunately, to make Israel a partisan wedge issue.

Also, they ought not assume from past comments by NDP and Liberal candidates that have surfaced over the course of the campaign that these parties, or centre-left parties in general, are hopelessly anti-Jewish or anti-Zionist. Nevertheless, perhaps the lesson here should be that pro-Israel, Jewishly literate people must become more involved in these parties so that Jewish views are understood and well-represented across the political spectrum.

Bottom line? If you want to, get involved. ■

Liberals, NDP target finance minister in CIJA debate

plungen@thecjn.ca

A debate featuring representatives of the three major parties got a little feisty on Sept. 30 as the New Democratic Party and Liberal candidates took turns targeting Conservative Finance Minister Joe Oliver on issues of economic performance, anti-terrorism legislation and support for Israel.

But Oliver gave as good as he got, questioning the Liberals' past record of voting against Israel at the United Nations and pointing out the NDP had some "problematic" members running in the election.

The debate was sponsored by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and was held at The Warehouse Venue in Downsview Park. The debate was moderated by The CJN's editor, Yoni Goldstein.

Both Liberal Bill Morneau, running in Toronto Centre, and NDPer Hal Berman, running in York Centre, took turns assailing the Conservative position that it uniquely supports Israel. Not so, Morneau and Berman said.

All the parties support Israel and the question of support should not become a divisive, partisan issue, Morneau said.

"We all support Israel," Berman agreed. Israel needs to understand that unless the Palestinians have a deal, there will be no peace. The NDP supports the peace process, he said, adding that "our country's reputation sucks now" because of the policies pursued over the last 10 years.

Oliver got in a dig at Berman and the NDP's position on Israel, saying, "You have some problematic members of your prospective caucus."

Turning to the Tories' position on the Middle East, Oliver cited the 2006 cut off of funds to the Palestinian Authority, the boycott of the UN's Durban II anti-racism conference and the prime minister's advocacy for Israel at a G8 meeting (in 2011 when the other countries proposed a resolution urging negotiations on the basis of the 1967 borders).

He also referred to the Canadian voting record at the United Nations under the previous Liberal administration, in which Canada supported resolutions condemning the Jewish state. And he stated that former Liberal prime minister Paul Martin – who Morneau said had reversed the trend of votes against Israel – had laid a wreath on the grave of Yasser Arafat. (Pierre Pettigrew, the foreign minister under Martin, laid the wreath at Arafat's grave in Ramallah, a few months after he attended his funeral.)

On the fight against ISIS, Oliver said the Canadian government is committed to continuing its participation in the coalition to degrade the Islamic State. He contrasted this position with that of his opponents, who he said want to run up the white flag of surrender.

Morneau said the Liberal position is to train local fighters to take on ISIS. "It's not a retreat."

Berman said the Conservative government had turned the country away from its traditional role as peacekeepers and into an aggressive country that drops bombs on civilians.

Both opposition spokesmen assailed the Tories' proposed bill to address domestic terrorism. Berman said the Conservatives are presenting a false choice between security and fear, while Morneau said that for all the posturing on domestic security, the Conservatives were spending less on security agencies and federal prosecutors than before. That prompted an interjection from Oliver, who disputed Morneau's contention.

Berman made the argument that "to have true security, we need to be respected... so people don't hate us."

There was a little drama in the Iran portion of the debate when Morneau asked Oliver for a yes or no answer to the question of whether Canada supported the P5+1 deal with Iran to limit its nuclear program. Despite Morneau's repeated request for a yes or no answer, Oliver said only, "We acknowledge the efforts of the P5+1."

Each of the candidates emphatically opposed the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

In introducing a question on genetic discrimination, Goldstein noted Jews' predisposition to diseases, such as cancer, that are linked to a person's genetic makeup. There is concern that insurers might deny coverage to people with the gene and that employers would avoid hiring such people. That could lead some to avoid the kind of screening that would reveal possible illnesses, he said.

Morneau said the Liberals had proposed a bill to prevent insurers from denying coverage or raising rates so high that people couldn't realistically get coverage. Oliver said that if re-elected, the government would reintroduce legislation preventing such discrimination and Berman, said such legislation would be a No. 1 priority for a New Democratic government.

On the question of poverty, Goldstein noted that about 15 per cent of Jewish Canadians live below the poverty line. Berman said the NDP has a strategy to lift 10,000 seniors out of poverty over four years. It will lower the small business tax to create jobs, it will launch a $15 a day daycare program with 100,000 spots to better enable women to enter the work force and it will put millions of dollars into affordable housing.

Morneau said the Liberal plan is to grow the economy and lift people out of poverty. A Liberal government would invest in transportation, affordable housing and green technologies. It would lower eligibility for the Guaranteed Income Supplement (GIS) and Old Age Security (OAS) programs to 65 from 67. And it would remove the Universal Child Care Benefit, which goes to millionaires as well as lower income Canadians, and replace it with the Canada Child Benefit, which will raise 315,000 children out of poverty.

Oliver said that under the Conservatives, more than one million low-income earners have been removed from the tax rolls, including 400,000 seniors. The Tories have increased the GIS more than in the last 25 years, and they have extended the Universal Child Care Benefit to four million families. He said more than 180,000 children have been lifted out of poverty because of government policies. ■

Shabbat Project expects more participants this year

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Building on the momentum from last year's inaugural Shabbat Project in Toronto, organizers are gearing up for another successful run that will bring thousands of Jews from across the religious spectrum together to keep Shabbat and take part in Shabbat-related programs.

The Shabbat Project started in 2013 after the chief rabbi of South Africa announced at a Jewish leadership conference that he wanted to start an initiative that would have all South African Jews keep one complete Shabbat on a certain date.

Although his idea was met with skepticism, it quickly caught on and spread to more than 460 cities worldwide.

Howard English, marketing director for the Shabbat Project Toronto, which this year will be held Oct. 23-24, said there are about one million people around the world who are participating in the international event.

"So when someone participates in Toronto, they are actually participating in one of the largest Jewish unity initiatives ever. It's grown globally, and we're excited to be such a significant part of it," English said.

Women at last year's Challah Bake

"Last year, about 7,000 people participated directly in some way, by going to an event, by being hosted in a home, by volunteering. We expect even more participants this year and we know from our research that we had done with those who had participated how meaningful it was for them."

English said that last year, 43 synagogues in the GTA took part in the event, and he expects more to sign on this year.

"Whatever their level of observance, no one should feel alienated from this project. We respect anyone who wants to experience Shabbat as never before at a different level, and we will do everything we can to help them fulfil that objective," English said.

"Even for those who are shomer Shabbat, who observe Shabbat strictly, what we're saying is, it is obviously a wonderful thing to do, but all of us who are shomer Shabbat can always move toward a higher level of appreciation and experience," he added.

"So our emphasis this year is on experiencing something, being able to say that I tasted Shabbat, I absorbed Shabbat in a different way and a more substantial way than I have before."

Dena Bensalmon, director of the Shabbat Project in Toronto, said the grassroots project has been built from the ground up.

"We got some good advice from South Africa two years ago. They said, 'Don't get stuck on an organizational level,'" she said. "If you call an organization or school or shul, and they say they're not interested, that's OK, because the people within that shul or school or organization probably are interested. If you figure out a way to get to them, they'll figure out a way to bring it back to their school."

She said a 15-page shul resource package was sent to 98 shuls in the GTA.

"It includes everything from links, to an unofficial guide on how to keep Shabbat to ice breakers for teenagers who want to meet each other in the afternoon."

Although programming is still taking shape, some of the main events include a cholent cook-off and tasting on Oct. 19-20, the Great Big Challah Bake on Oct. 22 at the Scarborough Convention Centre, and Havdalah programs at various locations throughout the GTA on Oct. 24.

"At the Challah bake last year, we had 2,340 people and this year, we'll have 2,500. We had 1,000 on the waiting list last year, and I assume we're going to have 1,000 on a waiting list again this year," Bensalmon said.

"The challah bake is huge. It is without a doubt Canada's largest challah bake," English said. "There is a spirit to the event, which is very moving and life-altering for some of the women."

As for the programs being organized for motza'ei Shabbat, there will be a number of concerts and events held at various synagogues throughout the GTA.

"This year, rather than competing with synagogues that are organizing post-Shabbat Havdalah events, what we're going to do is list the events that are taking place and a Shabbat Project representative will be at all the major events to thank everyone for participating, and particularly the shul for performing this wonderful mitzvah of celebrating Shabbat," English said. ■

Baycrest gears up for furry variety fundraiser

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Baycrest's second annual Dogs on the Catwalk fundraiser, a free community-wide event in support of Baycrest's volunteer services and its pet therapy program, will be held Oct. 20 at the Winter Garden Theatre and will again be hosted by TV personality Jeanne Beker and her beloved dog Gus.

Some 40 dogs and their owners are raising money for Baycrest volunteer services, which runs the pet therapy program. A Dogs on the Catwalk web page has been created, along with individual pet profiles unique to each dog, with photos and stories. The dogs' human counterparts sent messages to their circle of supporters to help fundraise through their pet profile.

Last year's event was based on a tongue-in-cheek beauty contest.

"This year, we have changed it and will showcase our top fundraising dogs in a variety show. The Baycrest residents have been looking forward to this event all year," said Ian Leventhal, director of leadership gifts.

There will be three segments to the event: a fashion show; a celebrity-dog look-a-like contest and a concluding "trick-or-treat" segment that will showcase the dogs' talents.

"With a fundraising goal of $75,000, we have raised $44,493.35 so far. That's 59 per cent of our goal," Leventhal said.

There are 2,000 volunteers who come through Baycrest at any given time.

"There are so many things that Baycrest wouldn't do or can't do without the volunteers, with all the services they provide. Pet therapy is one of a multitude of programs they furnish," Leventhal said.

There are two ways your canine friend can be in the show: either he or she is a registered pet therapy dog, or you can raise a minimum of $2,000.

"CutiePie Shiffman is our top fundraising star, raising over $12,000 so far, while Jack, Kitty, Tetley, Clancy, Moishie and Bobby have each raised more than $2,000. These dogs are all eligible to be in the show," said Leventhal.

"At Baycrest, we have run the pet therapy program for over 20 years, where volunteers and their dogs who have completed either Therapeutic Paws (training) or the St. John Ambulance program visit clients," said Karen Hirshfeld, Baycrest's professional practice chief for therapeutic recreation.

Dogs and owners in the program visit clients at the Freeman Family Day Centre, the Samuel Lunenfeld Mountainview Club and Baycrest, including palliative care, the Terraces of Baycrest, and the Apotex Centre Jewish Home for the Aged.

There is much literature and research that supports the use of pet therapy.

"In addition to the immediate 'in the moment' benefits we see when the dogs come to visit, such as improved mood, interaction and engagement, the literature also tells us that pet therapy can have a number of positive benefits for the residents after the visits are over. These include improved social interaction skills, coping and ability to communicate," Hirshfeld said.

Therapy dog Jackson is an eight-year-old poodle bichon.

"When I'm getting ready to take Jackson to Baycrest, I mention to him some of the residents' names, and his tail starts wagging in excitement and anticipation of his weekly visit – he recognizes where he is going," said his owner, Baycrest volunteer Sharon Kreiger.

While petting Jackson, Baycrest resident Ginger Howard-Freidman told The CJN, "I have these wonderful feelings of love, relaxation and happiness."

Every Sunday, Jackson can be seen pacing the fifth floor of the Apotex Centre.

"We go to concerts with the residents, we go to the gardens when the weather is nice, we talk together and we even play dominos. Jackson comes and sits down, and everybody pets him. If they can't reach him, I pick him up and he will sit in their lap. He loves it. He is Mr. Relaxation – Mr. Perry Como," Krieger said.

"Some of the residents even try to pinch Jackson's cheeks," she added with a laugh. ■

GUEST VOICE

When it comes to the niqab debate, where are the Jews?

Danielle Kubes

Back before Canada was Canada, Aaron Ezekiel Hart was elected to the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada. In 1808, when it was time to swear an oath of allegiance to the Crown, he covered his head and placed his hand upon the Old Testament.

His peers kicked him out of Parliament the next day.

"Sorry," they said. "This isn't how we do things here."

Nothing personal or anything, the legislators argued, but it's offensive that while taking this respected office, you're choosing to display your Jewish faith over the Christian principles upon which this successful colony has been founded.

So the argument went then, and so it goes now.

Zunera Ishaq wants to wear a niqab to her Canadian citizenship ceremony. This 29-year old high school teacher from Pakistan is perfectly willing to remove her veil in a private room before a female officer to confirm her identity when dealing with the actual citizenship documents, but wants to keep her niqab on during the symbolic ceremony, because there will be men and photographers in the room.

The courts have defended her right to do so – twice.

How is it that Jews have not come out in mass support of Ishaq?

No country, nation or empire in the three millennia we Jews have been dispersed has been a refuge to us like Canada. Quebec, thanks primarily to the battle fought by Hart and his sons, gave us our full civil and political emancipation in 1832 – almost 30 years before anywhere else in the British Empire.

Jews are not ignored and reluctantly tolerated, like we were in ancient Rome and the Ottoman Empire. Here, today, our rituals are encouraged and defended, by law and the populace, even though many, just like Islamic ones, clash with those practised by "old-stock Canadians."

So although we may find Ishaq's desire to cover her face offensive, weird and not of this time or place, we must nevertheless insist that the same laws that protect us extend to her.

It doesn't matter if there's merit to the federal government's argument that the custom is "rooted in a culture that is anti-women."

So what?

Our customs, after all, are also derived from a patriarchal religion. Many married women in our community, for example, cover their hair because they are governed by the same principle of modesty that drives Ishaq. As long as we and her refrain from forcing other women to do the same, we must be allowed to clothe and unclothe our bodies as we wish, and the state must accommodate us to a reasonable degree.

This has been the basis of Canada's multicultural policy for decades and the reason that although we lend the widest latitude to our religious minorities, we experience the least conflict between them.

Those who fear that Ishaq's niqab represents a culture so contrary to ours that they cannot coexist, that if we cannot protect our borders from the danger of her veil, we must at least insulate our most sacred institutions, should recall that this fear is identical to the one Jews were subject to in 1808 with the Hart affair. It's the same fear that Sikhs faced in 1990 when they fought to wear turbans in the RCMP. The hysteria is familiar and tiresome.

Be assured that if we allow this fear to aim its arrow at Ishaq's dress, the archer's bow will soon be spun around to face us.

We will end up like South Africa and Sweden, unable to circumcise our infants, or like France, turning away our men from voting booths while they wear a kippah, or like Quebec, just two years ago, fighting to maintain our sons' right to learn in public school while also covering their heads.

When we support Ishaq's freedom, we support our own. And if we do not fight for Ishaq, who will be left to fight for us? ■

'Of course I'm tribal. But that hardly means I'm illiberal'

If by the word 'there' you mean Judaism or its lack in the liberal Jewish world, you are correct."

"Great," I recall saying, "so what do I do now?"

"Go read Joseph Soloveitchik and then read his student, David Hartman."

I did as Rabbi Ellenson said. I read those two leading rabbinic thinkers again and again. That wholeness/hunger of mine was gradually replaced by learning, ideas, and intellectual and religious satisfaction. I had a core now – a Jewish one that allowed me to remain thoroughly modern all the while.

Love for the Jews and Zion, Hartman's especially, and awe of and curiosity about God, Soloveitchik's especially, have changed me as a Jew and as a rabbi. Year after year I revelled in the intellectual verve of both Soloveitchik and Hartman. Their thinking helped me create my personal Jewish ballast – an interior religious sensibility that has proved satisfying and sustaining.

What I learned from them went way beyond me. I began to believe that the best way to respond to what modernity had emptied out was for liberal Jews to be challenged and changed and solidified by traditional and engaging Jewish ideas. You don't have to accept them all, but you do have to know them. I believe that more than ever today, and much of what I have done as a rabbi has been to make this happen for other Jews.

Over time, I'd come to understand that the course I had set off on in the mid-1970s, one clarified by Rabbi David Ellenson and then inspired by rabbis Joseph Soloveitchik and David Hartman, was a kind of latent response to the hollowing out of the core of the Jews, first by assimilation and then by massive murder. The world of our grandparents and their parents had been vanquished. A rebuilding and refashioning of Jewish life – more than in numerical terms – was required. I wanted to be part of that.

If in our liberal precincts, we could steady ourselves internally with ideas and learning, buttressed by a deep and meaningful attachment to Am Yisrael (the people of Israel) and Medinat Yisrael (the State of Israel), then we might help steady and provide strength to the larger Jewish People.

Am I tribal then? Of course, I am! We have been decimated, we Jews in this 21st century. Much of our world, internal and external, has been destroyed in our lifetimes. Our Israel now is threatened as it hasn't been in decades.

Of course, I'm tribal. But that hardly means I'm illiberal, either in spirit or in deed. And so synagogues must be open communities, treating well and taking seriously every member, whether a part of us for 10 days or for 10 decades, whether known to us or not, whether recognized in our social milieu or not, whether strong of body or weak of spirit. Every Jew in our midst and beyond is worthy of our full regard. A religious community that does not honour this, in word and in deed, is neither religious nor a community.

This, too, is essential to cultivating a strong and transformed interior – to steady us personally with small acts of decency, to steady our people with inclusion of all in our midst, including those not Jewish who may wish to join the Jews. And, as much as anything, to strengthen ourselves with the literary and intellectual sustenance of the tradition.

Let me return to the story of Franz Kafka, the little girl, her doll and the inner transformation of the Jews. Ernst Simon, in telling the story, does so to demonstrate what he calls a "second naïveté" – that is, the sense of innocence necessary "to regain faith after having experienced the purgatory of secularization."

I understand this second naïveté as a chance to start over, to begin again without pretending you don't know what you do, without pretending what has happened hasn't happened. It's a chance to revive Kafka's experience and our own: to ensure the thriving of our own spirits and the survival of our own people. It's a way to provide necessary coherence, even as we understand the world is not necessarily coherent.

Kafka tried to do that for the little girl with a new doll. It is ours to do with learning, with ideas, with peoplehood and the love of Zion. Ours is an extraordinary inheritance, a great gift. It belongs to every one of us, every Jew. It's ours for the taking, and take it we must – for our sake, more than we can possibly even understand. ■

INTERNATIONAL

Benjamin Netanyahu stares down the world

DAVID HOROVITZ
NEW YORK

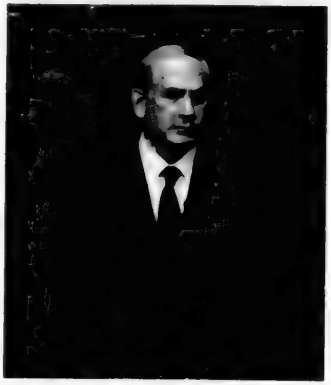
For 40 minutes at the United Nations General Assembly last Thursday, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu eloquently articulated the challenges posed to Israel and to the international community by Iran and by Islamist fanaticism.

He warned of the growing danger that Iran, "unleashed and unmuzzled," will constitute in the wake of its nuclear deal. And he castigated the Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for "libelling" Israel, from the same podium 24 hours earlier, by falsely asserting that Israel was seeking to harm religious freedom on the Temple Mount, when it was Islamic extremists who were desecrating the site by "smuggling explosives" into the Al-Aqsa Mosque.

But most dramatically, he rebuked the membership of the very institution where he was speaking – the United Nations – for tolerating Iran's relentless threats to destroy the Jewish state and "rushing to embrace" the regime.

"Seventy years after the murder of six million Jews, Iran's rulers promise to destroy my country, murder my people. And the response from this body, the response from nearly every one of the governments represented here," he charged furiously, "has been absolutely nothing. Utter silence. Deafening silence."

And then Netanyahu paused, staring defiantly, reproachfully out into the hall, head nodding slightly. For 44 very long seconds. In silent rebuke. And in apparent mourning for international morality.



Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addresses the United Nations General Assembly on Oct. 1. AVI OHAYON/GPO/FLASH90

The pause, the extended silence, was the theatrical centrepiece of this year's address. After his display of the Auschwitz architectural plans in 2009, and his presentation of a cartoon nuclear bomb in 2012, this was a prop-free gimmick, a wordless denunciation.

Like a biblical prophet, Netanyahu had come to warn, to chastise, and to indict.

As so often in recent years, he also used the occasion to deride the notion that Iran, under this regime, will abandon terrorism, rein in its rapacious regional intervention, or scale back its intercontinental ballistic missiles programs. Well-intentioned though it might have been, the nuclear deal will leave the Iranians "weeks" from a nuclear arsenal when its sunset clauses expire, he said bitterly. In the meantime, he asked, could anybody seriously believe that sanctions relief would "turn this rapacious tiger into a kitten?"

As in years past, too, he determinedly asserted his desire for a permanent peace with a demilitarized Palestinian state that recognizes the Jewish state. By announcing that the Palestinians no longer regard themselves as bound by the Oslo accords and other agreements with Israel, Abbas, this year, had made it a little easier for Netanyahu to assert that Israel was sinned against rather than sinning when it comes to the peace deadlock.

Again in common with previous appearances, he took pains to highlight the vital centrality of Israel's ties to the United States. Where President Barack Obama, on Sept. 28, had notably refrained from so much as mentioning Israel in his address, Netanyahu highlighted the bilateral relationship as "the most important that Israel has" and, however implausibly, asserted that both he and Obama consider their disagreements to be "within the family."

What was most strikingly different this year was the prominence and weight he gave to his assault on the international community's failed outlook, self-defeatingly skewed priorities and mistreatment of Israel.

He urged the world to at least hold Iran to the terms of the nuclear deal, deeply flawed though they may be. He encouraged the United Nations to help advance peace with the Palestinians – not via biased resolutions but by backing direct, bilateral talks. He pleaded for the UN to end its decades of "obsessive" Israel bashing. He sounded like a man of convictions, he did not sound like a man expecting to be heeded.

Bolstered by supporters in the gallery, Netanyahu found himself applauded for his sentiments with unusual frequency at this venue. But for all the ferocious anguish of his presentation, he knows that it will leave unmoved the overwhelming majority of global statespeople with whom he, and indeed much of Israel, are at odds. The Obama administration will not be recalibrating the nuclear accord. The French and the Germans will not be cancelling their trade trips to Tehran. The international community will not start making demands of the Palestinians. The numerous UN forums devoted to critiquing Israel will not henceforth reassess and devote more proportionate attention to Syria or any other crisis spot.

After a year in which the Iran deal was concluded over all of Netanyahu's loud objections, the Syrian civil war rages bloodily on, Islamic State continues its campaign of killing, and the Middle East remains predictable only in its chronic instability, Netanyahu is only too aware of how isolated he is. It is unlikely anybody will even have seriously registered his pledge that "Israel will not allow Iran to break in, sneak in, or walk in to the nuclear weapons club," and that "no one should question Israel's determination to defend ourselves against those who would seek our destruction."

The Israeli prime minister barked. The Israeli prime minister fell shamingly silent. But the UN caravan goes inexorably on. ■

Israeli officials criticize PA leader's United Nations speech

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu slammed Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Sept. 30 speech to the UN General Assembly as dishonest and accused him of having no intention of making peace with Israel.

"[Abbas'] speech is deceitful and encourages incitement and disaster in the Middle East," Netanyahu said in a statement shortly after Abbas declared to the UN General Assembly that the PA was no longer committed to prior agreements with Israel.

Netanyahu rejected Abbas' claims that the recent actions of Israeli security forces at Jerusalem's Temple Mount constituted an attempt to change the delicate status quo of the site, revered by both Jews and Muslims.

In his speech, Abbas had warned that Israel was in danger of turning a political conflict into a religious one. He accused Israeli "occupying forces" and "extremists" of attempting to divide the compound and preventing Muslim worshippers from exercising their religious rights. Israeli policies, Abbas warned, could lead to an "implosion" in the region.

"Unlike the Palestinians, Israel strictly adheres to the status quo on the Temple Mount, and is committed to continuing to do so in accordance with the agreements between Israel and Jordan and the Waqf," Netanyahu said in his response.

The prime minister urged Abbas to "act responsibly" and accept his offer from earlier in September to resume direct negotiations without preconditions. "The fact that he time and again has not responded is the best proof there is that he has no intention of reaching a peace agreement," he claimed.

Opposition leader Yitzhak Herzog also condemned Abbas' speech, while reserving criticism for Netanyahu as well. Herzog, who heads the Zionist Union party, said Abbas' references to Israel as an apartheid state were a "distortion" of the truth that would "only benefit the extremists on both sides." He also accused both Abbas and Netanyahu of engaging in "idle rhetoric."

Abbas accused of spreading lies and incitement

"Israelis and Palestinians deserve the hope of a normal life," he continued. "Abbas and Netanyahu are leaders who are afraid of making decisions, and instead emit slogans and recriminations while leaving us to face a difficult situation and an uncertain future."

Herzog urged Israelis and Palestinians to "take advantage of a rare opportunity in the Middle East to forge alliances with moderate countries that want to be our partners against rampant Islamist terrorism."

Avigdor Liberman, the former foreign minister who heads the right-wing opposition party Yisrael Beytenu, dismissed Abbas' warning that the Palestinians would no longer abide by agreements with Israel.

"This is another empty speech with empty threats," he said. "In all his years as chairman of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas has incited against Israel and the Jews, and the sooner he vacates his posts, which he holds non-democratically and illegitimately, the better."

Education Minister Naftali Bennett charged that Abbas had presented his own false version of events during his address.

"Abbas is returning to his days as a Holocaust denier, with a speech that rewrites history," Bennett said, in an allusion to Abbas' 1982 PhD thesis, which argued that the Zionists had collaborated with Nazi Germany to encourage Jewish immigration to Palestine.

Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked accused Abbas of "standing at the UN podium and spreading lies."

"While Israel maintains the status quo on the Temple Mount to the point of absurdity with a ban on Jewish prayer, Muslim rioters turn the Al-Aqsa Mosque into a warehouse for terrorism," Shaked said, vowing that Israel would "do everything necessary to preserve its sovereignty in Jerusalem."

The Temple Mount has seen a surge of clashes in recent weeks, with Palestinians accusing Israel of seeking to enable Jewish prayer there.

Culture and Sports Minister Miri Regev said that Abbas' speech demonstrated the Palestinian leader was the "true successor of the mass-murderer Yasser Arafat," and charged that he promoted an "anti-Jewish" and "pro-terror" agenda.

Regev said Israel would continue to build settlements in the West Bank as a way to combat "the delegitimization of the Palestinian Authority led by Abbas against Israel."

Ze'ev Elkin, the immigrant absorption minister, also countered Abbas' remarks, saying the PA had "long violated the Oslo Accords." Elkin said Abbas was responsible for continued "incitement" against Israel.

Tzipi Livni, a senior opposition member who used to be Israel's chief negotiator with the Palestinians, said diplomatic efforts such as Abbas' highly anticipated UN speech would work as leverage to force Israel to endanger itself.

"The speeches, the accusations, and the flags will not bring about a Palestinian state – only direct negotiations with Israel will do so," she said. "The attempt to make the international community force Israel to make sacrifices that would harm Israel's interests will not succeed and is doomed to failure."

Ayman Odeh, chairman of the Joint (Arab) List opposition party congratulated Abbas on his "brave stand" at the UN, adding in a statement that "Israel is to blame for the assassination of the Oslo accords with its repeated violations and attacks against the Palestinian people."

In his address, Abbas had said that the PA would cease to abide by agreements signed with Israel, including the 1993 Oslo accords, claiming Israel had shown that it, too, was no longer committed to them.

"So long as Israel refuses to commit to the agreements signed with us, cease settlement construction and release prisoners, Israel has left us no choice but to insist that we will not remain the only ones committed to these agreements," Abbas told the UN General Assembly in New York.

Israel, he said, must now "fully assume all its responsibilities as an occupying power... our patience for a long time has come to an end." ■

Pro-Israel groups rail at EU plans to label products

ROBERT SWIFT
JERUSALEM

Indications that the European Union will soon adopt a recommendation to label Israeli products originating in the West Bank has spurred pro-Israel groups into action. One advocacy group fighting the EU's intended initiative, The Israel Allies Foundation (IAF), hosted a gathering of parliamentarians from Europe, South America and Africa at the City of David archeological site this week in an effort to fight the decision to label West Bank goods and to bolster opposition to the anti-Israel boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, which it believes is behind the EU proposal.

Some politicians and activists have gone as far as condemning the EU act, suggesting a comparison to anti-Semitic acts from the World War II era.

"There are three elements to calls for boycott. First of all, university campuses; secondly, companies and thirdly, countries," Mark Pritchard, a British MP with the Conservative Party, told The Media Line. "With all three I would argue that... (they) need to recognize that Israel is a free and open democratic country in the Middle East, the only one in the (region)," Pritchard said. Like all of the visiting politicians attending the IAF event, Pritchard was firmly behind calls for BDS to be opposed.

Proponents of BDS have lobbied for the EU to change its policies towards Israel and to demonstrate opposition by its member states to Jewish communities being built over the Green Line – on land captured by Israel in 1967. Within a matter of weeks the EU may adopt a recommendation to its member states that goods produced in the West Bank imported into Europe be marked accordingly, a move reportedly advocated by the EU's foreign policy chief Federica Mogherini.

Pritchard explained that his motives for supporting Israel were linked to his belief in human rights. "There should be equality, equity, fairness, and social justice for everyone – including the Jewish People and the State of Israel," Pritchard said.

Other visiting politicians stated different reasons for their opposition to BDS. A number of those visiting Jerusalem were from center-right and Christian political parties.

The EU should not become involved in BDS as it has not taken sides in other political standoffs and would therefore be singling out Israel, Peter Ostman, a Finnish MP and the chairman of the Christian Democratic Parliamentary group, told The Media Line.

> They need to recognize that Israel is a free and open democratic country in the Middle East
> Mark Pritchard, British MP

Racism is the motivation behind the EU's planned treatment, Josh Reinstein, the director of the Knesset Christian Allies Caucus, said. "The campaign of BDS is classical anti-Semitism, it's the same tricks and storyline that they've done for hundreds of years. It's blood libel... just with a twist because they say 'Israel' instead of 'Jew' now," Reinstein said. The threat posed to Israel by such a boycott was significant, the director suggested, explaining that BDS had the potential to grow in both scale and impact.

Responding to criticism of the BDS movement, Sarah Colborne, the director of the Palestine Solidarity Campaign (PSC), argued that in effect the international community is allowing Israel to continue its actions in the West Bank, east Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip with impunity. This, she argues, despite a United Nations resolution calling for an end to such practices and an accepted international norm that the Geneva Convention forbids collective punishment, as demonstrated by the siege of Gaza.

"(PSC) has long campaigned for the labelling of products from the illegal Israeli settlements in the West Bank... The UN says the settlements have no legal validity and the EU judges them to be the single biggest obstacle to peace," Colborne asserted. She suggests that any boycott of Israeli goods is a peaceful form of resistance and emulates sanctions placed against the South African government during apartheid, "its aim is to bring about... freedom, equal rights and justice for Palestinians and Israelis."

The EU is expected to make a decision on the labelling of products in the coming weeks. If the proposal is accepted it will merely be a recommendation and will not be binding on the EU's 28 member states. ■

Thousands pay their last respects to slain Israeli couple

MARISSA NEWMAN
JERUSALEM

Thousands of mourners gathered in Jerusalem for the funerals of Eitam and Naama Henkin, who were shot to death in the West Bank on Oct. 1.

Speaking at the funeral on Oct. 2, Israeli President Reuven Rivlin emphasized Israel's sovereignty over the West Bank and said settlement construction would continue. He stated that, in the same way that Israel never built because of terror, it wouldn't stop building because of it.

The Israeli couple, in their early 30s, and their four children were ambushed while driving between the settlements of Itamar and Elon Moreh, when two Palestinians opened fire with a handgun and a rifle. Both parents were struck multiple times in their upper bodies, paramedics said. They were pronounced dead at the scene. The children, aged nine, seven, four and four months, were unharmed.

In his eulogy, Rivlin said Naama Henkin had sent him a letter after the murder of Danny Gonen, 25, in a June terror attack in the West Bank, and signed it "A citizen who cares."

"I replied to you. I told you that the land is ours in its entirety, and under our sovereignty it is our responsibility to see to its security and the security of our citizens," he said. "I promised that I would continue to embrace the terror victims and visit every home in which the lights have been extinguished forever. I didn't think, it didn't occur to me, that your light would go out, and I, we, would embrace your children."

Eitam Henkin was the son of Rabbi Yehuda and Chana Henkin, who moved to Israel from the United States in the 1970s. His mother, Chana, runs the Nishmat Institute, a Jewish learning institution that was one of the first to teach women Talmud and Jewish law. Rabbi Henkin, a noted Torah scholar and author of several volumes of responsa, also serves as the school's Jewish law authority.

"Now we, the grandparents, will raise the children," Chana Henkin said at the funeral. "Eitam and Naama, we'll raise them as you would have."

Eitam's mother added that her son was "innocent and modest, happy, and idealistic" and praised his writings on matters of Jewish law.

"Since you found your magnificent Naama, I don't recall you complaining about anything. It was amazing to see the powerful love between the two of you, the total dedication to your children," she said. "Naama, you entered our family 12 years ago, and from the first moment, we loved you."

Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon toured the site of the attack with Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gadi Eisenkot and Shin Bet chief Yoram Cohen and vowed the terrorists would be swiftly caught.

The security forces will "spare no efforts to arrest the killers and their sponsors," Ya'alon said.

The terrorists fled the scene after the terror attack, prompting a manhunt in the area. A unit within Fatah's armed wing assumed responsibility for the attack.

Hundreds of Israelis marched near the scene of the shooting, and urged the building of a settlement outpost in the Henkins' memory, Israel Radio reported. ■

Lakes of Canada album inspired by classic Atwood tale

dkoren@thecjn.ca

In 1985, iconic Margaret Atwood penned one of her most influential works to date. The Handmaid's Tale, set in a dystopian future where Christian theocracy has overthrown the government. The novel deals with segregation based on gender, race, and class, but specifically focuses on women, envisioning a society where feminism has been reversed, and females are stripped of their basic human rights.

Some 26 years later, Jake Smith, frontman of Montreal's Lakes of Canada, was rummaging through his mother's bookshelf when he stumbled upon the novel in unfortunately tragic circumstances. A year earlier, Kathleen Smith was murdered in her home, and it had fallen upon her son to tidy up her belongings.

Smith, mesmerized by the book's themes, could not put it down. Its inspiration led him to write one song after another until it became apparent that he had enough material for a concept album. The result is Transgressions, Lakes of Canada's sophomore effort, a record that is quintessentially Canadian.

"I've always been a big fan of speculative fiction," Smith tells The CJN, "and given that it centres around women, the book spoke to me, because I was still reeling from a violent act toward my mother."

According to Smith, he and his mother were "probably more close than most children are with their parents." Though he describes his upbringing as culturally Jewish at most (he did meet fellow co-founder Conor O'Neil in synagogue), it was after his mother's death that he really connected with religion.

"I think one thing Judaism does really well is mourning, as it's quite the opposite of moving on. Someone died, so you're going to pray for them and spend time with family, and I observed all of that. I found it really helped me connect not only with the memory of my mother but with my faith."

Smith then recalls a time when his rabbi asked if he believed in God. "Not exactly," he replied, "but I do believe in love and family and connection," to which the rabbi replied, "that's great." Smith appreciated that his rabbi didn't push religion on him, just as long as he was asking questions and had some kind of faith. "People have to discover faith on their own," he says. "It's a lot stronger that way."

While Lakes of Canada described their debut as "a cross between Fleet Foxes and Simon and Garfunkel," Transgressions, out next week, is anything but. Smith explains that the shift was something they wanted to do, but also necessary to record their new album. "We felt we had to pay sonic tribute to the subject matter, and started to incorporate all these different elements," he explains. "We listened to a lot of religious music, and a lot of gospel while recording."

It shows.

Naturally, writing a concept album is an entirely different affair than penning your standard LP. "I find that concept albums are more cohesive, more interesting. There's been a trend as we live in the age of singles that has been moving away from that. But when you're trying to write a cohesive piece, it becomes easier because you can transition better. It just flows."

During the process of writing and recording Transgressions, the band reached out to Atwood, to let her know that they sought to introduce The Handmaid's Tale to a new generation.

"She was really encouraging. We're going to send her the record next week, which I'm both excited and terrified of doing. Her opinion of the record is more important to me than pretty much everyone else's."

In explaining Transgressions to Atwood, the band called it "fan fiction" as there are aspects of the record directly lifted from the book. But the album also continues the story after it ends. "We have songs about what happens after Gilead [the military dictatorship formed within the United States where the novel is set]," Smith says.

The band also re-orchestrated the entire album as an acoustic version, which will be released with an accompanying documentary later this winter. "There's a fundraiser we did for a local women's shelter that will tie in with the release of that, and we'll be donating a portion of sales to the shelter as well." ■

Ethiopian singer got her start in IDF band

Ester Rada

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Israeli-born singer Ester Rada and her hot band brought their invigorating blend of Ethiopian jazz, R&B and funk to Toronto recently for the city's 14th annual Small World Music Festival.

Rada, a soul singer who's of Ethiopian heritage, forged her sound after completing her army service singing Israeli pop songs in an Israel Defence Forces band. With the release of her debut EP in 2013, she became an overnight sensation. Rada's stop at Toronto's Revival Bar, where she performed for a good-sized, enthusiastic crowd, was part of a three-month world tour.

Rada sang in English, Hebrew and Amharic, performing selections from her mostly self-penned 2014 full-length recording Life Happens, including the catchy song of the same name. Also from the album, the reggae-influenced Sorries stood out, as did Rada's rendition of Nanu Ney, a traditional Ethiopian chant she sang in Amharic. Rada, whose voice has echoes of Nina Simone's, performed a compelling version of Feeling Good, a song Simone covered.

What made Rada's set less than perfect, though, was that her six-piece band, a group of superb musicians, often drowned out her vocals, a glitch that could be attributed to the club's sound system. Rada spoke little during her set, but the powerful singer did tell the audience that she and the band were bringing Toronto love from Israel.

She was born there in 1985, in Kiryat Arba, a Jewish settlement outside Hebron. A year earlier, her parents, Falash Mura, descendants of Ethiopian Jews who were forced to convert to Christianity, had been flown to Israel from Africa through Operation Moses. Rada listened to Ethiopian music at home and sang in a synagogue choir. When she was 10, her family moved to Netanya.

"We lived in a very religious town, Kiryat Arba. During my childhood, I was in the synagogue a lot. I was very religious. Only at the age of 10, when we moved to Netanya, I discovered there was a whole world I didn't know before," she told the Vancouver Sun last April. Living in Netanya, she discovered the singers who are her main influences, Aretha Franklin, Whitney Houston, Erykah Badu, Lauryn Hill, Jill Scott and Alicia Keys, as well as jazz artists Ella Fitzgerald and Simone.

At 20, when she was discharged from the army, Rada started singing as a solo performer and embarked on an acting career, appearing on stage, on Israeli television and in movies. She was nominated for an MTV Europe Music Award for Best Israeli Act, she's performed at England's Glastonbury Festival and she opened for Keys in Israel.

Rada told the Vancouver Sun that her next career goal is to "keep performing and affecting people's hearts all over the world ... to keep growing and learning and loving, and making music."

She lives in Jaffa with her husband, Gili Yalu, the singer of Zvuloon Dub System, an Israeli reggae band. The Small World Music Festival presented Rada's Toronto show in association with the Koffler Centre for the Arts and the Batuki Music Society. The concert was sponsored by the Israel Consulate General, Toronto and Western Canada. ■

'But what the hell is it in Yiddish?' (and other questions)

Chaimie and Leizer

Jews love questioning. It's genetic (see Moses, Job, our forefathers, our actual fathers). And we love questions (see Passover's Four Questions, "If I am not for myself…", "You call that smoked meat?").

While our chutzpadike Yiddish comedy YidLife Crisis can be seen as taking the pish out of organized religion, it came from a place of love and respect for Judaism's encouragement of questioning, from shuk bargaining to debating with God himself about his own existence! Can you believe the chutzpah? (also a question)

We ourselves have been asked many questions about our show along the way, but the most recurring is "Why Yiddish?"

Like all good Jewish questions, this one has more than one answer.

At first, our instinct to use Yiddish was visceral. Yiddish sounds funny both to Jews and non-Jews. Its cadence, vocabulary, dynamics, they're just funny. It is hard from the comedic standpoint (where we stand) and not the academic standpoint (where we don't stand unless we're told) to articulate why that is, but we feel like most would agree.

As we realized we would do "Seinfeldian" conversations and debates – albeit not 'about nothing' but rather the very meaning of what it is to be a Jew in the 21st century – a theory emerged. We wanted to pay tribute to our comic heroes and greatest influencers – Larry David, Jon Stewart, Mel Brooks, Joan Rivers, Jackie Mason – and decided that all of them were essentially performing Yiddish vaudevillian comedy, just in English (kind of like their surnames, their Anglo exterior concealing a rich Yiddish tradition). The cadence, the physicality, the gesticulations, the very phrasing of the humour was inherently Yiddish. So we would reverse engineer it back into the language in which it 'should have been done.'

Part of our mandate was about bridge building within and outside of our community. Since we intended on setting our "love letter à Montréal" in the Mile End, where cultures collide and where the perception of Judaism may be somewhat narrow, we wanted to portray a different view of Judaism than usually seen there, speaking the very language heard around that shtetl – a language, it should be noted, that was once the third most spoken in Montreal – but purposed in totally multicultural contexts (i.e. spoken while eating poutine at La Banquise), as Yiddish had existed in non-orthodox contexts for years.

But more to the point, we received a great compliment when questioning our own Yiddish abilities (and trust us – others happily questioned with us.) An Orthodox rabbi from Montreal, and native Yiddish speaker, moved us when he said that "Yiddish is not just a language, it is a lens through which we view the world, and in that, you guys are fluent." And that meant the world to us because, at its core, that is what our show is, and what we feel that Yiddish is – a culture, a shared story, a history, a people, complete with all its wisdom and suffering and neuroses and kvetching and kvelling – all embedded within the language. It uses the Hebrew alphabet, our ancient holy language, and combines it with the eastern European diasporan experience, from Germanic roots to Slavic countries, and for the future, anywhere else we go. It contains it all. It is religious-ish and secular-ish – just like us. And it's beautiful. And, yes, hilarious.

And as we approach the secular festival of Thanksgiving and pause for a moment of reflection, we thank those that helped make our show possible and watch it, and reflect on the question:

Why Yiddish?

The definitive answer, of course, is, "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? If I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?"

So we answered with a question. What are you going to do? ■

Klezmatics to headline Winnipeg's first-ever KlezFest

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENCE, WINNIPEG

KlezFest is coming to Winnipeg on the weekend of Oct. 10 and 11 and co-producers Bev Aronovitch and Miriam Bronstein are anticipating a warm Winnipeg welcome for the first-time event.

"The Saturday evening concert by The Klezmatics sold out quickly," Aronovitch says. "That's no surprise considering our community's deep appreciation for Jewish culture. We're expecting the Sunday afternoon concert to sell out, too – and we already have 75 local singers, dancers and musicians booked for the Sunday morning workshops."

In addition to The Klezmatics from New York, Winnipeg's KlezFest will feature Montreal-based vocalist Janie Respitz and Winnipeggers Myron Schultz, Daniel Koulack, Kinzey Posen and Shayla Fink, four of the six members who founded the popular Winnipeg klezmer group Finjan.

Bronstein and Aronovitch are both longtime music teachers – although Aronovitch is best known for having founded the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre 27 years ago. Bronstein's teaching career was largely in the Jewish school system here.

The Klezmatics perform in Winnipeg this week

Aronovitch was inspired to create KlezFest after attending the annual KlezKanada in the Laurentians in the summer of 2014.

"It was the most amazing experience," Aronovitch says of KlezKanada. "I had been more involved with jazz the last few years. I had lost touch with my connection to Jewish music. KlezKanada reconnected me with my Jewish musical roots.

"I persuaded Miriam that Winnipeg would be a perfect place for a KlezFest."

Aronovitch notes that the Sunday morning workshops will revolve around the theme "Common Roots: a Musical Journey Through the Shared Roots of Klezmer and the Music of Other Cultures."

The KlezFest faculty, she says, will be led by the four Finjan members, Klezmatics' Frank London and Lorin Sklamberg, Respitz, and Yiddish dance expert Steven Weintraub from Philadelphia, who was previously in Winnipeg for a conference that was organized by the Manitoba International Folk Dance Association.

"The workshops have been designed to be interactive and informative," Aronovitch says. "Musicians will be able to play along with workshop leaders and everyone will have a chance to sing and dance."

Klezmer Jam, the final concert on Sunday afternoon, will showcase all of the klezmer performers. ■

Singer pays tribute to Frank Sinatra's music

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Broadway singer Ryan Silverman teams up with three other singers in a Toronto Symphony Orchestra tribute to the 100th birthday of singer Frank Sinatra, taking place Oct. 13 and 14 at Roy Thomson Hall.

"The music of Frank Sinatra is essentially the voice of the most beloved songs of America in the 20th century. Frank Sinatra not only made songwriters famous for his vocal interpretation of songs, but also for re-arranging the songs to introduce them again as he became mature," said Silverman in a phone interview from his home in New York.

Silverman teams with singers Storm Large of Pink Martini, Tony Desare, and pianist Frankie Moreno in offering unique vocal interpretations of Sinatra hit songs, including Luck Be A Lady, My Funny Valentine, My Way and New York, New York. Silverman's contribution to the concert will include up tempo arrangements on the songs Just In Time and Moonlight Becomes You and he will sing a less popular Sinatra song titled Love Till I Die.

"Although not all of Frank Sinatra's songs became radio friendly hits, his interpretations were unique, and I wanted to perform Love Till I Die so the audience can hear how special this song was."

Silverman's rich, sultry voice has been heard in a number of Sinatra tribute concerts, which took place in such venues as Carnegie Hall in New York, the Kennedy Center in Washington, Atlanta, Indianapolis and Westchester, N.Y.

Ryan Silverman stars in Let's Be Frank

"What makes the Sinatra concerts so much fun is that the vocalists have an opportunity of changing the arrangements of the songs as Sinatra often did to make the song sound new."

Born in Grande Prairie, Alta., Silverman considers himself lucky to have become one of the few Canadians to have made a name for himself on the Broadway stage.

When not on the road with Sinatra tribute concerts, Silverman is currently cast as Billy in the musical Chicago. He has also been on Broadway playing Raoul in Phantom Of The Opera and Tony in West Side Story.

Other theatrical credits include national tours of Grease, Mama Mia and Wicked among other musicals.

"Everything happened by accident. I did not plan to be on Broadway. In fact, I wanted to be a radio disc jockey and so my plans changed as offers came to me," said Silverman.

He was adopted as a 10-month-old child to parents of French and Irish heritage. Although his adoptive parents let Ryan keep his birth name of Silverman, he was not raised Jewish by his adoptive parents.

"My birth mother gave me up when she had me at age 14. From tracing my roots, I discovered that my paternal grandfather was from Romania and is Jewish. He did not raise my father as Jewish and I do not know what the circumstances were for him not to be raised in Judaism."

Although many in show business mistake Silverman for being Jewish, he is proud of knowing about his Jewish roots and was happy to be cast as Mendel in the William Finn musical Falsettos.

Silverman sang the song Four Jews In A Room Bitching in the musical.

Following his graduation from McEwan University in Edmonton, Silverman considers his big break in musical theatre was to be cast in the musical Blood Brothers.

"I was fortunate. The casting director in Blood Brothers thought I was better than any of the other actors who auditioned. Once I had a visa for working in the United States, I went to live in New York."

The 37-year-old musical theatre star followed up his role in Blood Brothers, a musical with dark, dramatic overtones with a comic twist, as one of the three fathers in the musical Mama Mia.

Silverman stars in Let's Be Frank, a tribute to Frank Sinatra on his 100th birthday with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 13, 8 p.m. and Oct. 14, 2 p.m. and 8 p.m. For tickets, call 416-598-3375 or go to www.tso.ca ■

Félix et Meira is Canada's Oscar consideration

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Félix et Meira, a tender movie about the improbable adulterous affair between a young Chassidic mother and a francophone Quebecer, has been selected to represent Canada for consideration as a possible nominee in the best foreign language film category at the Academy Awards to be held in February.

Directed by Montrealer Maxime Giroux, Félix et Meira premiered at the 2014 Toronto International Film Festival where it won the award for best Canadian feature film. It tied for the top prize at Montreal's Festival du Nouveau Cinéma last year.

Since then it has screened at more than 50 festivals around the world, winning more awards, and has enjoyed theatrical success in Canada and the United States.

"Félix et Meira, a love story about two people from vastly different worlds, has moved Canadian and international audiences," said Carolle Brabant, executive director of Telefilm Canada, in making the announcement on Sept. 25. Telefilm Canada, a federal agency, chairs the Canadian Oscar selection committee.

Although the subject matter may be scandalous, Giroux sensitively handles the genuine feelings between the couple and is respectful in the depiction of Chassidim and their way of life.

The cinematography of Montreal's Mile End and Outremont neighbourhoods is alluring, and the scenes of Chassidic life, rarely witnessed by the public, quite authentic.

Much of the film's appeal is due to the understated performances of the Israeli actress Hadas Yaron (Meira) and her betrayed and bewildered husband Shulem, played by Luzer Twersky, an American actor who grew up in a Chassidic community in Brooklyn, which he has left.

Despite his carefree persona, Félix (Martin Dubreuil), a bachelor approaching middle age, is adrift and melancholy, especially since his wealthy father's death. Meira chafes at her restricted role and husband's gentle, but domineering, ways, and eventually succumbs to a strange man's ardent pursuit.

> We never imagined that the movie would be so successful.
> Director Maxime Giroux

Giroux, 39, has been fascinated by his Chassidic neighbours since he moved into Mile End a decade ago,especially because of their insularity and his inability to communicate with them. The research he conducted to understand them better eventually laid the foundation for the movie.

He described the title characters as "two marginalized people, two fragile beings who are attracted by the unattainable, the forbidden fruit."

Above all, he said he wanted to portray their humanity.

Upon hearing that he may be in the running for an Oscar, Giroux stated: "When we started working on Félix et Meira in 2011, we never imagined that the movie would be so successful once it was finished. The process to secure funding for the project was particularly difficult, but we never questioned the potential of this unique film."

He added that Telefilm Canada, a leading funder, believed in the project from the start.

Giroux's third movie has received close to 20 festival prizes including the Tobias Szpancer Award for best film in the Between Judaism and Israelism Competition at the Haifa International Film Festival in Israel.

In 2014, a record 83 countries made entries in the foreign language film category. Eight Canadian films have been nominated in that category over the history of the Oscars.

The Canadian Oscar selection committee comprises 23 representatives from the country's film industry and major government cultural agencies.

A Canadian-Palestinian film produced by another Montrealer, Ina Fichman, has been submitted by the Palestinian Ministry of Culture for Oscar consideration in the foreign language category.

The Wanted 18, co-directed by Canadian Paul Cowan and Palestinian Amer Shomali, is an animated documentary feature set at the beginning of the first intifadah. It tells the story of how residents of the West Bank town of Beit Sahour tried to start their own dairy industry in order to end their dependence on milk from Israel.

The title refers to the 18 cows the Palestinians tried to hide from the Israeli army, which deemed their activities a security threat.

Fichman, a veteran documentary filmmaker and head of Intuitive Pictures, co-produced The Wanted 18 with Nathalie Cloutier of the National Film Board of Canada. It was already won a number of awards. ■

Book shows a lesser-known side of this rosh yeshiva

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

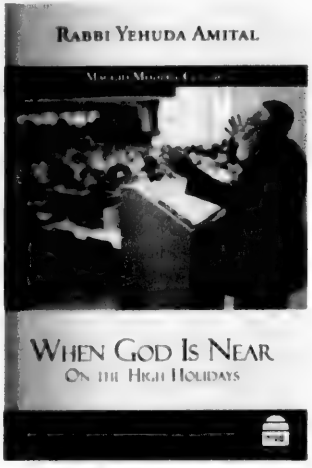
Rabbi Yehuda Amital (1924-2010) was a compassionate, charismatic and occasionally controversial leader of the National Religious (or modern Orthodox) Jewish community in Israel.

A Holocaust survivor, he was liberated at the end of 1944. He moved to Israel right away and served in the Israeli army in the War of Independence. He pursued a career in Jewish education, and in 1968, became a founder and rosh yeshiva (head of school) of Yeshivat Har Etzion, one of the first institutions set up in the territories that Israel won in the Six Day War.

Partly because of the yeshiva's location and partly because of the teachers and students it attracted, the yeshiva and Rabbi Amital were originally considered to be on the right wing of the Israeli political spectrum. However, in 1988, Rabbi Amital founded the Israeli movement Meimad, a short-lived political party of religious Jews who wanted Israel to take more courageous steps toward making peace with Palestinians, including territorial compromise.

Many Jews knew Rabbi Amital best for his political involvement. But he saw his life work as being a rosh yeshiva. In an attempt to make this side of his life understandable to English readers, Maggid Books has published a collection of talks that he delivered to his students over the years during the High Holiday season. The talks were adapted and edited by his son, Rabbi Yoel Amital. A thoughtful afterword by his son-in-law, Rabbi Yehudah Gilad, discusses the philosophical and educational themes in the talks.

Taking the words of an Israeli rosh yeshiva speaking to his students and bringing them to life for non-yeshiva English speakers is not an easy task. The translator must have command of biblical, rabbinic and modern Hebrew, as well as Aramaic. Familiarity with the sources themselves is a must, since much of the discussion involves texts building upon each other.



When God is Near: On the High Holidays
by Rabbi Yehuda Amital, translated by Karen Fish and others

Maggid Books, a division of Koren Publishers

Seven translators took part, although most of the work was done by Karen Fish. The result is almost always readable and accurate. Occasional lapses occur. For example, when Maimonides explains how God measures people's righteousness, the Hebrew text reads: "The reckoning is not based on the number of merits and sins but on their magnitude." (Mishneh Torah, Laws of Repentance, 3:2).

Here, Maimonides' statement becomes: "The reckoning is not based only on the number of merits and sins but also on their magnitude." Maimonides' text does not require improvement or toning down.

Still, the book does successfully convey the values of this special rabbi. Readers see that he, unlike many other heads of yeshivot, did not teach his students to withdraw from the culture around them and concentrate only on Torah. He did not encourage or even allow his students to think that since they were involved in serious study of holy texts, they were superior to the rest of Israeli society.

A large portion of the book consists of Rabbi Amital's explanations of the biblical story (Genesis, 22) of the binding of Isaac, when God tells Abraham to take his son Isaac to a distant mountain and sacrifice him there. Abraham complies, but at the very last moment, the tragedy is averted when an angel tells Abraham to stop. This story is a central part of the Rosh Hashanah service, and we will also be reading it again in synagogues in a few weeks.

The Bible tells us nothing about Abraham's state of mind during the three days that he and Isaac were travelling to the site of sacrifice. Some religious thinkers have portrayed Abraham as a "knight of faith," a term coined by the Christian thinker Soren Kierkegaard. Many think of Abraham as a silent paragon of faith and submission who follows God's instructions dutifully even when he does not understand them.

Rabbi Amital rejected this interpretation. He repeatedly taught his yeshiva students that rabbinic Judaism understood the story of Abraham and Isaac differently, quoting the line from the Mishnah (Taanit, 2:4) that says that in Temple times, people offered the following prayer on fast days: "He who answered Abraham at Mount Moriah – may He answer you and listen to your cry on this day." (A version of this line has survived as part of the Slichot service in use today, too.)

Rabbi Amital pointed out that this meant the ancient rabbis understood that Abraham did not accept God's command silently. Rather, he beseeched God to spare Isaac. This point is also made in other old rabbinic texts. Rabbi Amital often quoted this one as well: "His [Abraham's] eyes opened with a great weeping, and he sighed a great sigh… and said, 'I lift up my eyes to the mountains; from where shall my help come?'" (Yalkut Shimoni, 1:101, quoting Psalms, 121:1).

"We are familiar," Rabbi Amital taught, "with the phenomenon of the suppression of any human or parental feeling while in the throes of religious ecstasy. In biblical times, this found expression in the worship of Moloch, and in our times, we see the attitude in the response of our neighbours to the death of a 'shahid' [martyr]." According to Rabbi Amital, Abraham passed God's test by not giving up on his human parental feelings. Jewish tradition, he taught, "seeks to emphasize the humanity of Abraham."

Human feelings and emotions, Rabbi Amital taught, are not at odds with religious behaviour, but are an integral part of the practice of Judaism. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

Keen for a seat in others' sukkahs

Lauren Kramer

I had no desire to build a sukkah until I became a mother, at which point the desire was born with a vengeance. All of a sudden, a sukkah on Sukkot was not just necessary – it was essential.

Memories of the sukkot my father had erected in my childhood years returned with full force, and I was determined that the mitzvah of building and dining in the sukkah would become part of our family tradition.

Little did I know, it was easier said than done.

Dutifully, my husband went off to the hardware store, returning with various metal poles and sackcloth to form the walls. Four hours later, our sukkah was looking half decent, but a few days later, after wind and rain, it was a dishevelled mess on the ground that took several more hours to clean up.

The poles were sequestered in a dusty corner of the garage and the wind-torn cloth was saved for another year with better weather. We were disillusioned with the prospect of building a sukkah, and even the kids' excitement as Sukkot drew close, couldn't bring us to try and build one again for another couple of years.

A few years later, I decided there had to be a better way, and a mail order sukkah seemed just the right mixture of ease and convenience. I began a search online and learned that money could buy a sukkah that went up in minutes rather than hours. We purchased one with white tarps, bungee cords, metal connectors and metal poles for around $350, adding bamboo schach from the local hardware store. The day we proudly erected our new sukkah, the sun was beaming down, and the prospect of moonlit meals under the schach seemed appealing and infinitely possible.

Then the rain arrived. Overnight the wind tore holes in the tarp, destroyed the paper decorations our kids had crafted and vetoed any possibility of an outdoor meal. Over the next few years, the sukkah was erected and dismantled dutifully in the days before and after Sukkot, but the weather pattern repeated itself time and again. Eventually my husband threw up his hands in despair. "Seriously? We're going to build it again?" he asked.

> It always seemed too chilly, too rainy or too windy to make an October meal out there feasible

Since we'd never actually spent any time in the sukkah – it always seemed too chilly, too rainy or too windy to make an October meal out there feasible – I couldn't come up with a positive answer. The sukkah sat in the garage for a few more years before a comprehensive clean-up became inevitable. That's when I realized there was no point in continuing to store those poles, tarps and bungee cords. I found a local community member who fostered the same early sukkah zeal I'd had a few years earlier and was willing to take them off my hands. I gladly donated every one of them.

Now that my sukkah is gone, I have sukkah envy on the occasions we're invited out. Some years, the weather is plain nasty and we huddle under blankets and warm jackets in other people's sukkah, wondering why we're subjecting ourselves to an outdoor meal.

But every now and then there's a beautiful, still, starlit evening and beneath the schach, feasting on someone else's brisket and roast chicken, you can feel the magic in the air. That's when I find myself wishing our sukkah had had a different future.

These days, our kids have grown, and the idea of creating our own sukkah is no longer one greeted with enthusiasm. It's getting harder to find folks in my neighbourhood who still erect a sukkah, but nonetheless, every time this holiday rolls around, I furtively hope we'll get invited out by someone who continues the tradition.

There's a saying: "The best boat is your friend's boat." Selfishly, I'm thinking the same might be true of a sukkah. ■

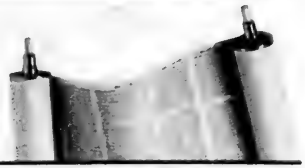
Bereshit | Genesis 1:1-6:8



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier searches for the positive lessons to be found in the story of Eve
Rabbi Denise Handlarski considers how creation and destruction can coexist in our world
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen explores Hakhel, the gathering of the nation at the end of shmittah

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

Along with other struggles and challenges of the human experience, the pangs of childbirth are a result of Eve's punishment following the temptation in the Garden of Eden.

The Tzena Ur'ena, a 17th-century Yiddish prayer book for women with translations and explanations of the biblical readings for Shabbat and holidays, suggests a fascinating custom that arose among pregnant Ashkenazi women. The custom is based on the midrash that suggests the fruit that so tempted Eve was the etrog. Tzena Ur'ena suggests that after Sukkot, a pregnant woman should bite off the tip of the etrog.

According to the prayer to be recited at that time, this act was a corrective to Eve's impetuous act. Unlike Eve's impatience in eating the fruit, women now wait until the conclusion of Sukkot to indulge this temptation. Additionally, the prayer sought to invalidate the curse of Eve, and specifically birth pangs.

However, as the mother of four daughters, I can't help but look for the positive lessons that Eve teaches us.

Some interpreters explain that the formation of Eve from Adam reflects her inferiority. Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch (19th-century Germany), in his comment on Genesis, 2:22, explains that the formation of woman from the side of man creates two equal creatures. He says man was created out of earth – out of the raw material – and woman was created from man, which was something already formed.

Eve represents our feelings as we bring children into the world. A child is not born out of raw material, with no prior experiences to guide her or him. A child is born to learn from the experiences that preceded the birth.

Our hopes for our children are that they will learn from the past and not make the mistakes that we made; our dreams are that they will take the blessings they have been born with and become better versions of ourselves. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal, where she lives with her husband and four daughters.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

Bereshit, beginning with "in the beginning," signals to us the possibilities for reading each parshah anew each year. This year, I'm struck in particular by the parallel possibilities in the text.

For example, we have two competing stories for the creation of woman. In Chapter 1, the text says: "And God created man in is image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them." In Chapter 2, the creation of Adam and Eve, we find that Adam, lacking a "fitting helper," was made to sleep so that God could "fashion" Eve into a woman from Adam's rib.

In the first chapter, man and woman are created at the same time and as equals. By contrast, Eve is created to be Adam's helper, and given that she comes out of his body, the text implies that she is to be subservient to him. We have embedded in this parshah, the possibility for equality between the sexes and then, immediately, its reversal.

And there are other examples. Bereshit begins by describing the creation of the world, and then the Adam and Eve story ends with their expulsion from paradise. In each case, there is the possibility for beauty and goodness and then its immediate undoing.

As the parshah continues, we get the story of Cain and Abel, the first pair of brothers to know jealousy and to fight.

So, the Torah begins with stories of both creation and destruction. But why? What can we learn? The world we've been given is beautiful, yet through our choices, we make it ugly. Or, that creation and destruction, good and evil, beauty and ugliness, must all coexist in our world. Or, that we should pause and wonder at the marvel of our own existence and, simultaneously, be careful not to squander the wonderful gift that is life. Bereshit contains these contradictions that make up the texture of our lives and, fittingly for the first parshah, the very complexities we find in the rest of the Torah. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is assistant rabbi with Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

As I write this column, we are deep into the federal election campaign in Canada (and in the United States). Crowds are flocking to hear their favourite candidate. There is nothing like being part of something live.

At these rallies, journalists ask parents with children, "Why did you bring your child?" They answer that they want their child to be a part of history.

As we enter this historical year of "Hakhel," the gathering of the nation at the end of shmittah, the sabbatical year, we relive that awesome moment when millions of Jews, men, women and children, scholars and laypeople, infants and great-grandparents, assembled in Jerusalem on the Temple Mount.

There was a hush as the king would begin to read sections of the holy Torah. It was an inspiring moment of unity.

This event, called Hakhel, to gather, was unlike other time-bound mitzvot – it was the only event that required every Jew to attend.

Why should children be at such a gathering? We're told that this experience of awe is so deep, that it touches everyone, and in the Hakhel gathering, everyone can sense their purpose.

The biblical mitzvah of Hakhel is only for a time when all the Jews live in Israel.

However, as with other campaigns, the Lubavitcher Rebbe took this mitzvah from the "shelf" and made it relevant for today.

The Rebbe encouraged all Jews, in the year of Hakhel, to use this auspicious time to assemble everyone, to gather and increase in mitzvot and Torah study.

So in this Hakhel year, exercise your civic duty and vote, to be a part of Hakhel and change the world. Bring your children to pray with a fellow Jew. Show your love and solidarity with your people, do a mitzvah.

May we merit to the ultimate Hakhel gathering in Jerusalem, with Mashiach, and in our days! ■

My challah baking lesson

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

This past July, I spent a wonderful afternoon with several of my friends at a challah baking class. Challah is Jewish soul food. Baking challah is a mitzvah, a real connection to yourself, your community, your family and the Jewish People.

Gail Michalowicz was invited to teach us to how to make a delicious challah recipe. We also had the privilege of learning from her many of the traditions and meanings for making challah, as well as all the steps and prayers involved along the way. Michalowicz is very involved in the community-wide "Generation to Generation" challah bake of 2,000 women and girls planned for Oct. 23 and 24. She urges that Jewish women in our community should consider being a part of it. For more information, check out: www.ShabbatProjectToronto.com

At the beginning of our lesson, we were each supplied with a disposable apron, a bowl and a spatula. All the ingredients were laid out on the table and we went to work. Michalowicz explained to us that as we put the challah ingredients together in the bowl, it is an opportune time for prayer and reflection. With the addition of each ingredient, we think of the deeper significance and meaning behind its physical reality. We learned that:

The Bowl: Represents the home, and each additional ingredient should bring its unique blessing.

Flour: Represents the raw material we desperately need for substance.

Sugar: As we pour in the sugar we hope and pray for a life that is a "Ma Tov U'Ma Nayim" or has sweetness and good things.

Salt: We hide the salt in the flour to remind ourselves not to be overly critical, and also to accept the sting of criticism from others.

Yeast: Represents the understanding to keep growing and expanding.

Water: Represents a life of clarity and wisdom. For the Torah, our instruction book to living, is called "Mayim Chayim" or the water of life.

Oil: Represents abundance and blessing. Jewish kings were anointed with oil for blessing and understanding. As we pour the oil into the bowl, we think of anointing each member of our family with blessing and understanding. Surprisingly, we learned that we start with ourselves, as we are the heart of the home.

Eggs: Represent fertility and the cycle of life because of their shape. We pray for the strength to travel the cycles of life and for fertility.

Last, we take all of these varied ingredients and knead them together into an exquisite challah dough. This symbolizes that we need to take all the different people and relationships in our lives and knead them into a beautiful unit and community.

We learned that when making dough with more than 12-1/2 cups of flour, an olive size portion of dough is removed that is actually called "challah," and a special brachah or prayer is said. This is done to remember the mitzvah of challah as prescribed in the Torah. This piece of challah was given to the kohen, thereby showing appreciation and reinforcing trust in HaShem.

Michalowicz also showed us how to make a braided bun, a loaf challah and a braided challah. We were sent home with our challah dough to let it rise for the last time and bake it in our own homes as is the tradition. I made my dough into cute little buns and the aroma wafting from the oven made my house smell wonderful. ■

Challah recipe

- ❑ 1 tbsp. salt
- ❑ 7 cups flour, starting with 6 1/2
- ❑ 3/4 cup sugar
- ❑ 1 1/2 tbsp. instant dry yeast
- ❑ 2 cups warm water
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 1/2 cup oil (plus a bit extra for oiling the dough)

In a large bowl combine all the dry ingredients: flour, yeast, salt and sugar. Add the warm water, oil and eggs and mix to make a soft dough. Knead the dough for 10 to 15 minutes. Oil the dough and cover the bowl. Let dough rise until doubled, approximately 45 minutes to 1 hour. Punch down and shape. Let rise an additional 45 minutes.

Heat oven to 350. On a floured board, shape or braid challah, as desired, and place on cookie sheet covered with parchment paper. Bake for 30 to 45 minutes depending on the size, until golden brown. Challah is baked when it sounds hollow when tapped.

Chloé Valdary: Zionists must create their own narrative

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Chloé Valdary, 22, a recent University of New Orleans graduate, is the founder of a campus group called Allies of Israel, which promotes Israel advocacy.

Valdary has written articles for the Huffington Post, Tablet magazine, and the Jerusalem Post, served as a consultant for the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA), and worked as the assistant of directors for the Institute for Black Solidarity with Israel (ISBI).

Late last month, she was invited to a student leadership conference organized by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies to speak about strategies to combat the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement on campuses.

Valdary, who is a Tikvah Fund fellow and the founder of a non-profit organization called Declare Your Freedom, which celebrates Zionism, spoke to The CJN about her mission to combat anti-Israel rhetoric.

Under what circumstances did you become an outspoken Israel advocate?

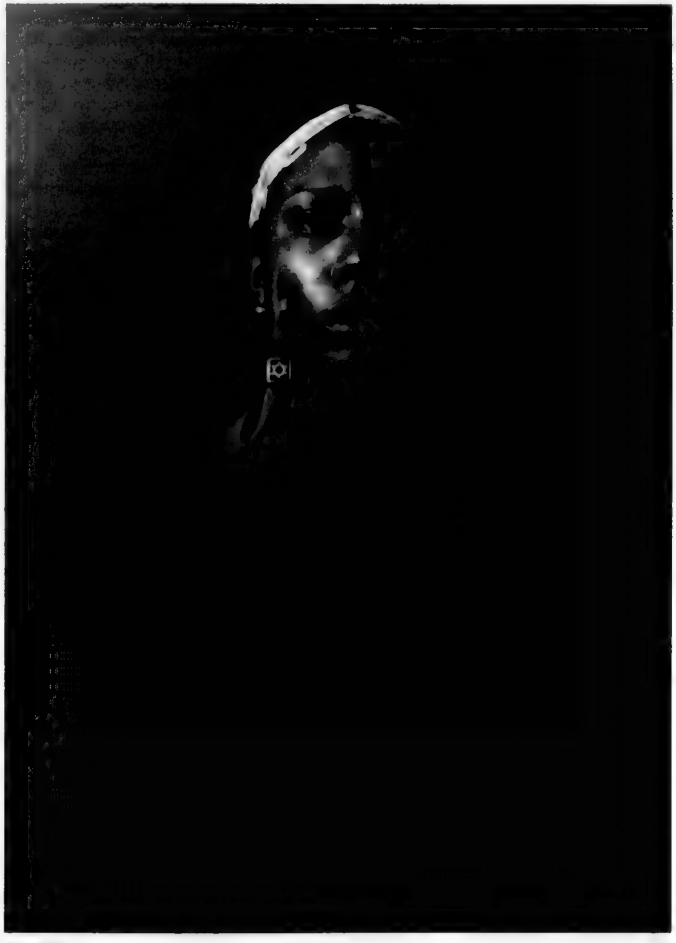
I started pro-Israel advocacy in college in great depth, but I was involved in studying Jewish culture in high school. I read a lot of Jewish literature, specifically books by Leon Uris, and when I got into college, books by Elie Wiesel as well. I also have an interesting cultural background. My family, which is Christian, observes all the Jewish holidays, and Shabbat and kosher style when I was growing up.

I became an advocate in college when I realized that anti-Semitism was rising globally.

What message did you bring to the FSWC conference?

I talked about my personal story, my philosophy when it comes to Zionism, specifically, what it is about and what it is not about. Namely, Zionism is not about the Arab-Israeli conflict, and neither is the story of Israel. The Arab-Israeli conflict is a part of the story, but it is not the fundamental story of Israel. Until we begin to understand the complexities and depths of what Zionism is about – and in my estimation, it is about, in part, a love story between a people and its land, the celebration of an indigenous people returning to their land, and Zionism is a political manifestation of the radical notion that Jews should be free – that's what it is on a basic level.

For me personally, I don't really feel compelled to explain everything that the IDF (Israel Defence Forces) does in a particular region. Once you understand that Zionism is not about the Arab-Israeli conflict, the actions of the IDF, whether they be good or bad, whether they be right or full of mistakes, which they are sometimes, does not threaten the legitimacy or Zionism, so therefore it is irrelevant to the conversation that we should be having on college campuses.



Chloé Valdary

What is the biggest challenge for pro-Israel students who are faced with aggressive anti-Israel activists?

I think one of the biggest challenges is transcending the usual cycle we see within the pro-Israel world, which is that anti-Israel people define their narrative, and we base our advocacy on trying to correct it and on trying to answer their narrative, as opposed to creating an entire curriculum based on our own narrative.

I think this is one of the biggest challenges, not only for students who are outspoken and face aggressive anti-Semitic organizations on campus, but just in general. I think this is the biggest challenge for the pro-Israel community.

Until we transition from that to create our own narrative, we'll be stuck, and we won't make progress, in terms of winning the conversation on college campuses.

Does it make sense to ignore, rather than engage, the small minority of students who are making noise?

There are a number of campuses where no one cares what SJP (Students for Justice in Palestine) is saying, and they are coming across as radical and too confrontational for mainstream students to actually care. But I would say that regardless of whether or not that was true, the pro-Israel world should be promoting their narrative anyway.

In my sophomore year and junior year, there was no SJP, but we were constantly promoting a certain narrative about Israel and Zionism on college campuses.

We understood that the validity and legitimacy of our narrative is not contingent upon the presence or the appearance of naysayers or dissenters. It is supposed to be sustained by itself.

Having been the subject of personal, and sometimes racist, attacks based on your views, do you feel that people feel more threatened by pro-Israel advocates who aren't Jewish?

Yes, because we pose a certain threat, so to speak, to anti-Israel people because people claim that Zionism is exclusive or discriminatory or exclusionary, and so it fights against that if you have someone who is non-Jewish fighting against anti-Israel rhetoric.

What happens with me, when I talk to people who are anti-Israel about my love for Zionism, they start to say things that don't make sense because they actually can't wrap their heads around that concept. I have gotten threats, and stuff like that, so I think there is a more visceral hatred, in some cases as least, for people who are non-Jews who are Zionist and promote that, because it carries a lot of weight and it poses a huge threat to the anti-Israel movement.

Can you tell me about the piece you wrote that was critical of anti-Israel groups equating the black civil rights movements with the anti-Israel movement?

I wrote that piece for Tablet magazine last year, called To the Students for Justice in Palestine, a letter from an angry Black woman, and it addressed the fact that the language they were using was definitely and deliberately emblematic of causes of the civil rights movement. Historically, not only were many luminaries in the civil rights movement pro-Israel, but they were self-professed Zionists who came out against the Arab boycott.

It was ignorant and disrespectful to that history of the actual record of people involved in the civil rights movement and also it was like pilfering another people's legacy for their own cause, which I thought was unacceptable. ■

The gift of a good question

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The problem of suffering in the world is perhaps the greatest challenge that religion must face. How can religion explain or rationalize suffering – often ostensibly of the innocent?

Judaism has been wrestling with this question since biblical times, but it is a question without a solution, as any authentic answer would mean knowing the mind of God, an impossibility for the finite, human mind.

Yet, question we must, for humans are by nature inquiring and endowed with a searching awareness. Jews in particular are a curious lot, obsessed with questions, regardless of whether or not there is an answer. In fact, given the Jewish genius for questions, it would appear that the questions matter far more than the answer.

In the Bible, God instructs Abraham to "Go from your land, your birthplace, and your father's home" to the land that He will show him. A midrash compares Abraham's wanderings to a man who sees a palace in flames: "Is there no owner?" the man asks. The owner of the palace replies, "I am the owner." The midrash compares this story to Abraham, who asked "Is it possible that the world lacks a ruler" to which God replied, "I am the ruler, the Sovereign of the Universe."

What does Abraham's leaving the familiarity of his home for an undesignated place that God will show him have to do with a palace in flames? Maybe the midrashic story is conveying the idea that once Abraham, the first monotheist, who accepted the idea of one God in a world of pagans, left the reassuring cocoon of home and hearth, he was confronted by a world that challenged his belief to the core of his being.

The world is like a burning palace – a stunningly beautiful natural and man-made creation that is constantly in danger of destruction. Whether by natural or human forces, the world seems barely to survive every onslaught. Abraham, like those of us who follow in his footsteps, will wonder if there is any rhyme or reason to it all – if there is an "owner," someone responsible, in charge.

It is important to note that in this story the palace is in flames, and yet the midrash does not indicate that it is burnt down or lost, nor is God's reassurance accompanied by any explanation or reason for the palace being so seriously threatened in the first place.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks explains that the story rejects the notion that the flames – our woes and suffering – indicate that there is no God and no purpose. However, the idea that there is a Sovereign does not preclude there being flames. God exists, but so does suffering. The one does not negate the other.

Abraham must accept this conundrum if he is to understand the world and represent the painful truth that humanity will always be in danger of disorder and chaos. As Rabbi Sacks states, Judaism is not a celebration of the world as it is, but a protest that the world is not as it ought to be.

The question really is more important than the answer. As long as people question why things are as they are, protest injustice and heal the suffering, attempt on any level to engage the world to make it a better place, we will be doing what we are intended to do.

Perhaps the major Jewish contribution to civilization, after monotheism itself, is the idea that we have the obligation to question everything, as long as the questions are good and lead to something positive and constructive. The palace will always be in flames and we will never fully comprehend why.

That fact does not mean that there is no God. It does mean that we have the responsibility to recognize our role in preserving the palace and acting decisively and effectively. If that lesson alone were what Judaism has given to the world, it would be a most magnificent and luminous gift. ■

Sarah Silverman's election endorsement, and Waters gets Stern rebuke

Jewish comedian backs the Dippers

U.S. comedian Sarah Silverman weighed in on the Canadian election Oct. 4 when she tweeted her praise for NDP Leader Tom Mulcair "4 supporting a women's right to wear what she wants without discrimination" – a reference to the ongoing niqab debate. She also tweeted her support for Vancouver-Granville NDP candidate Mira Oreck. Silverman met Oreck, a PR consultant and former Canadian Jewish Congress official, when Oreck helped create a 2012 pro-Barack Obama Internet ad starring Silverman. Oreck told various news outlets the two have kept in touch but aren't close, and she denied claims the unexpected support violated a law against foreigners endorsing candidates in Canadian elections.

Shock jock raps Floyd founder

Radio shock jock Howard Stern ripped Roger Waters, founding member of rock band Pink Floyd, for his support of the boycott Israel movement. "What is with Roger Waters and the Jews?" Stern asked Oct. 6 at the start of a seven-minute rant on Sirius XM Radio, in which he implied Waters is an anti-Semite. The rant was sparked by an open letter Waters published in Salon criticizing rocker Jon Bon Jovi for his Oct. 3 gig in Tel Aviv.

Howard Stern

"The Palestinians are these Arabs that could live in Egypt, they could live in Saudi Arabia, but guess what? Those countries don't want them either," Stern, who is Jewish, said. "Israel has a little tiny country, and it bugs the s--t out of Roger Waters. He can't f---in' deal with it. Where do you want the Jews to go, Roger? You want them just to go back to the concentration camps? What is it you want, f---head?"

Standup in the Holy Land

Comedian Jerry Seinfeld is bringing his stand-up routine to Israel for the first time. Seinfeld will perform in Tel Aviv on Dec. 19, the Jerusalem Post reported. The famed comic, who starred in the hit 1990s TV show Seinfeld, last visited Israel in 2007 while promoting the DreamWorks animated film Bee Movie. Tickets for his show went on sale Oct. 8. Seinfeld's latest project is the Web series Comedians in Cars Getting Coffee. ■

CIJA's priorities

Mira Sucharov's column ("What really are our community's priorities?" Oct. 1) shines important light on the diversity of policy issues and challenges facing Canadian Jewry.

As she noted, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) recently surveyed nearly 2,000 grassroots community members across the country on their priorities. The study paints a picture of an engaged, passionate, and varied community. Canadian Jewry is as concerned about universal matters of social justice, such as affordable housing for vulnerable Canadians, as we are about Jewish security and continuity, including the rising cost of Jewish education and kosher food. We are as dedicated to advancing human rights in Canada, including a ban on genetic discrimination, as we are to advocating for the right of Israelis to live in peace and defend their children.

Just as our community is not one-dimensional, our approach to advocacy must be comprehensive and ambitious. To settle for less would be to neglect the myriad of challenges before us and fail to live up to the Jewish tradition of activism across the spectrum of policy areas.

Shimon Koffler Fogel, CEO, Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs
Toronto

Mira Sucharov criticizes CIJA for discouraging Hillels from engaging Peter Beinart during his 2012 speaking tour in Canada. What she fails to mention is that Beinart is a prominent supporter of boycotts of Israelis.

While Beinart "only" wants to boycott settlements, his willingness to lend vocal support for the very same measures advocated by anti-Zionists (and anti-Semites) betrays his own reckless naivete or willful blindness.

If CIJA discouraged Hillel from hosting such a speaker, CIJA deserves applause, not criticism, for taking a principled stand against boycotts, divestment and sanctions regarding Israel.

In support of Harper

Columnist Bernie Farber, by viewing matters through a political prism, causes harm to the fight against anti-Semitism ("Political differences are no longer unzera – between us," Sept. 24).

Farber makes reference to "progressive Zionists who remain fully engaged with the Jewish state" but don't like the policies of the Likud party and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Does he think that the anti-Semites and ayatollahs of the world give a whit as to which political party is governing Israel?

To impugn Prime Minister Stephen Harper's strong support of Israel and the fight against anti-Semitism as fear mongering is destructive and has no foundation.

Canadian Jews and people of good faith recognize that anti-Semitism and the unfair treatment of Israel are not driven by politics, but the banality of evil.

Regrettably, very few world leaders have spoken out so eloquently and clearly as has Stephen Harper.

Support anyone but Harper

As a synagogue-affiliated, social work educator, I found Michael Taube's column offensive ("Why Jews should vote for the Tories," Sept. 24).

He boasts that the government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper has moved in the right direction by dealing with "the wasteful spending on bloated social services." So soon after Yom Kippur, and we get a Conservative party booster's haughty glances against social services that help people who are homeless, hungry, or otherwise in despair.

Yet it's been the Harper Conservatives who have worsened poverty and inequality in Canada, via tax cuts for corporations and for rich people, triggering cuts in public revenues, and forcing cuts in social services.

Harper's Conservatives have failed miserably in protecting us from climate change's looming disasters.

As a Zionist, I want Israel to thrive. Instead, Harper is further endangering Israel by supporting its misguided expansion of volatile Jewish settlements in the West Bank on Palestinian territory at the expense of Palestinians.

On Oct. 19, the Conservatives are the worst choice. Let's vote for change.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Do we need a Jewish pope?

We pray for a utopian period led by a messianic figure, but Judaism has survived and thrived by expressing itself in multiple forms, without a single leader or uniform approach

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: With all the hype and media attention around Pope Francis' recent visit to the United States, I find myself musing about the state of our people, popeless as we are.

We don't even have a chief rabbi – Israel must have two chief rabbis, one for Sephardim and the other for Ashkenazim. And we certainly don't believe in rabbinical infallibility (just ask my congregants). Still, it's interesting to ponder: if there was a Jewish "pope" in some alternate reality, what would his message be? Would he be liberal or conservative? What colour would his (or her) yarmulke be?

Is there a message you think is universal enough for all Jews that the "Jewish pope" could successfully convey to the world about Judaism and the Jewish People?

Rabbi Grushcow: What a question!

I agree with you that our people certainly are not looking to grant anyone infallibility, nor should they. After all, even the high priest had to confess his sins on Yom Kippur, and rabbis, thankfully, are not even meant to be priests.

But when I think of moral leadership, I think of a rabbi like Sidney Shoham, may his memory be for blessing. He was a giant in the Montreal Jewish community for more than 50 years. He led by example. He was a superb pastoral rabbi, there for people in times of joy and sadness. He was a gifted teacher. And above all, he was a mensch, permeated by a love of other human beings and klal Yisrael. He beamed kindness. And, to me, a relative rabbinic newcomer and a female liberal rabbi, he, an Orthodox rabbi, extended warmth and collegiality. That's the kind of leadership I would want in a Jewish pope.

But I believe anyone worth the title wouldn't want it. And I also believe that our religion has survived and thrived by expressing itself in multiple forms, resistant to a single leader or a uniform approach. None of us know, in the long term, which way is the best way forward, which rabbi will be quoted generations from now and who will be forgotten.

And if we couldn't even agree on a gender, far be it from us to reach consensus on a message – or even the colour of a kippah.

Rabbi Korobkin: And yet, the traditional liturgy is replete with prayers for a future utopian period led by a messianic figure. Such a person is supposed to unite our people at the end of days, so that we truly feel like one nation instead of disparate tribes.

I agree that such a person will need to regard ahavat Yisrael, a genuine love for every single Jew, as the highest value, as well as compassion for every living creature. This Messiah is also supposed to lovingly welcome every human being to worship God and live a righteous life.

I think the person who came closest to being a Messiah for our generation was the Lubavitcher Rebbe, and I'm sad that the void since his passing hasn't been filled with another leader possessing that same degree of vision, charisma and love.

We need to be more proactive in creating our future leaders and imbuing them with this kind of ahavat Yisrael. It should be the most important value inculcated into our children from a very early age.

Rabbi Grushcow: In the Reform liturgy, we have long since replaced the prayers for a single, human messiah with our hopes for a messianic age. As my mentor, Rabbi Robert Levine, titled his book: "There's no Messiah, and you're it." Each of us bears responsibility for getting closer to that messianic age, instead of waiting for someone else to come and save us.

Do we need to teach ahavat Yisrael? One hundred per cent. But for that love to be truly inclusive, it would have to recognize that the norm – and even the ideal – of our broader community is not exclusively Orthodox. It would have to recognize, and honour, that there are Jews making Jewish homes with non-Jews. It would give kavod, respect, to religious leaders across the denominational spectrum. It would celebrate different ways of being Jewish.

I'm not holding my breath. But I believe that another one of the most important Jewish values is hope. Perhaps our dialogue helps bring us one step closer. ■

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

"They thought of everything."

From Yoni's Desk

We've done our part, now it's up to you

After a hard-fought campaign, the longest in modern Canadian history, the federal election is now just days away. It's an exciting, and nerve-wracking time, for politicians and voters. Soon enough, we'll all find out who will be Canada's next prime minister, and which political party – or perhaps parties, should the results lead to the formation of a coalition government – will run Parliament.

We couldn't think of a more appropriate way to cap our election coverage than by offering the leaders of the three main parties the opportunity to speak directly to Canadian Jews. Over the last few days, I had the privilege to talk one on one with Stephen Harper, Justin Trudeau and Tom Mulcair (our interview with Green Party leader Elizabeth May ran in the Sept. 24 edition of The CJN).

It's a testament to the vigorous political engagement of the Jewish community that the party leaders took time from their busy schedules to offer their thoughts on a wide range of issues, including domestic security, Israel, the Iran nuclear deal, poverty and the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel. (In the interest of fairness, I asked the same questions to each of the leaders, and all three interviews ran to nearly the exact same length.)

Many newspapers and media outlets across Canada have already announced their endorsements for prime minister, and in the coming days more publications will present their own official opinions as to whom they believe Canadians should vote for on Oct. 19. But you won't find any of that in this space.

Of course, our columnists and editorial contributors have been offering their thoughts on the election throughout the campaign, and we have encouraged them to weigh in from any number of angles. Even so, this newspaper has a long-held tradition of non-partisanship, and, frankly, I think that's the right approach.

It's not for us to tell you who to vote for. Our job is to present the facts as neutrally as possible, and I'd like to think we've done a good job of that. The rest is up to you. Good luck.

Even as Canadian Jews are consumed with the federal election, we watch with trepidation the unfolding situation in Israel, where violent attacks by Arabs against Jews have erupted in recent weeks. (See pages 36, 38 and 40)

The stories are bone-chilling: parents murdered in front of their children; pedestrians stabbed to death as bystanders looked on and did nothing to help; cinderblocks hurled at automobiles, civilians and soldiers; and a spate of wild assaults involving rudimentary weapons.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas set off this wave of terror at the end of September when he accused Israel of scheming to change the status quo on the Temple Mount during a speech at the United Nations. There appears to be no basis for Abbas' claim, but that hasn't stopped some Palestinians from taking him at his word.

In response, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu instituted a number of new security initiatives. He also banned Knesset members, Jewish and Arab alike, from visiting the Temple Mount. These are not long-term solutions, but then it's hard to see how to move forward productively while the irresponsible Abbas remains an authority figure. ■ — YONI

Who will be Canada's next prime minister?

As election day draws near, The CJN speaks to the three party leaders about domestic security, Israel, Iran, BDS, the economy and more

The CJN: How is your campaign going thus far?

Stephen Harper: You never know these things for sure until election day, but our core message is that we're in an unstable global economy and we need a solid economic plan for the next four years, based on lowering people's taxes, making affordable and effective investments and keeping our budget balanced.

That's the big choice here: the other guys are proposing runaway spending and deficits, tax hikes and things that have put other economies into the gutter. And we need to keep moving forward with a positive plan.

The CJN: In your view, how is this campaign different from previous ones?

Harper: There's always all kinds of dynamics that are different. The economy is the number one issue. I think it's been the number one issue for the past couple of campaigns, but I think probably now more than ever that's what people are thinking about. They think about four years ahead and where they want the economy to be.

The CJN: When it comes to domestic security, what will your party do to ensure the security of Canadians?

Harper: We've moved forward with a series of strong legislative measures. What we've certainly tried to do, particularly since the jihadist attacks we had last October, is we've moved forward with a series of measures to make sure that our security and police agencies have all the resources we need, but also all of the modern tools that western security and police agencies have around the world.

The CJN: How is your campaign going thus far?

Justin Trudeau: It's going very well. We've focused on the big issues that matter to Canadians – economic growth, jobs, help for the middle class and those who are working hard to join it, and we're seeing people respond very positively right across the country.

The CJN: In your view, how is this campaign different from previous ones?

Trudeau: I think what is remarkable about this campaign is just how volatile the electorate is. People are open to a wide range of different options and the longer campaign means that people are taking time to really listen to different proposals and think about who has the better plan for growing our economy, for facing the challenges that we know Canada is facing. I think that is, frankly, to our advantage, because we are very much focused on a concrete and real plan to kick-start our economy and help Canadians.

The CJN: When it comes to domestic security, what will your party do to ensure the security of Canadians?

Trudeau: Canadians expect their government to do two things – protect our security, and defend our rights and freedoms. The Liberal party has gotten that balance right in the past, and we're going to continue to get that balance right in the future. Irwin Cotler, who was justice minister in the times following 9/11, steered through the kind of proposals that made Canada safer, but defended our rights and freedoms.

The CJN: How is your campaign going thus far?

Tom Mulcair: We're thrilled. We started this week in southwestern Ontario in six Conservative ridings, and we have every intention of winning each and every one of them – those are the ridings hardest hit by the job losses in manufacturing.

We started in Brantford, Ont. We went to Waterloo, Ont. We went to Stratford. We went to London, Sarnia and Essex. And it was an amazing tour. We met thousands and thousands of people who were buoyed by the NDP's message of hope and to do things differently – to get back to a balanced economy and start creating good jobs.

Mr. Harper wants to kill off tens of thousands of new jobs with his [Trans-Pacific Partnership] trade deal. We try to remind people that that's not just a number – each one of those job losses represents a family that loses its livelihood, a community where there's nobody going to the restaurant anymore, more small businesses suffering and closing down. So it's a whole new approach that we're proposing, and we're very uplifted by the reaction we're getting.

The CJN: In your view, how is this campaign different from previous ones?

Mulcair: What's different this time around is that there's hope.

You know, after 148 years of being told we have no choice but to alternate between the Liberals and the Conservatives, there's hope. There's an NDP government in waiting, because, for the first time in our history, we're the official Opposition.

REFLECTIONS

A modern (Jewish) family

Phyllis Feldman

A few years ago looking around the table at everyone settling into their seats at dinner to celebrate Pesach I remember thinking, "this is not at all how it was when I was growing up."

The week before, my former daughter-in-law Whitney and my son Brandon's fiancé Dyna, spent a Sunday afternoon with me, making matzah balls and baking mandelbroit. At least, we said that's why we got together, but production was way down the list from laughing and making memories. I always enjoyed the family gatherings at my mother's house, but I'm sure I never heard the words fun and prepare used in the same sentence.

All of the family members and any other guests invited to my parents' home for the holidays were white, middle class and Jewish by birth. We didn't know anyone else.

They all even belonged to the same mainstream Conservative synagogue. No one was "divorsssed," and there were definitely no single moms. We were inclusive though because we had two adopted cousins.

At our table we were one Jew by choice, a few people who went to a Reform Temple, one Reconstructionist, one Chinese-Canadian, one Filipina, and one divorced and one single mom, both there with their kids. Also in attendance: one shaved head and a pierced tongue.

To my left Whitney, before marrying my son Jonas, was from a lapsed Anglican home. Her single sister, Samantha, and her delicious four-year-old daughter Delilah were sitting next to Ellen, my nephew Mark's girlfriend, and her two-year-old cherubic son Nathan. To my right, beside my husband Irving on the other side of the table, Dyna, who immigrated from Guangzhou at eight, and then my 92-year-old mother-in-law Bella, Holocaust survivor, and matriarch of the family. Next to her was her Filipina caregiver Lorlie.

Out of the corner of my eye, Marjena, our Polish helper here to keep the kitchen running smoothly, is motioning to me that she's got everything ready to go.

"Who wants to join me to light the candles?" I invite everyone. Whitney is first up, Delilah – climbing on a chair – is already covering her eyes, and Dyna began reading the prayer from transliteration.

At my parent's table, it was assumed all the kids my age, especially the male children, would go to university and make the short list of acceptable professions, and if you were female, at least marry one.

When we start dinner and I hear Brandon, the pilot, ask Jonas, the military recruiter/classical trumpet player, to "Pass the horseradish please," and Dyna, the banker, tells him that Mark, the guitar teacher has it, I think to myself, "I like it so much better this way."

We serve the soup and I wink at the girls, because it's time for the much anticipated matzah ball test. "I like them hard," and "I only like them soft" ping pong back and forth across the table, as we wait for the decision of the 18 judges. Hearing the unanimous declaration of "They're great," the girls exhale, and since this was Dyna's first attempt, under Whitney's supervision, they're both pretty pleased.

Because our table configuration is a large rectangle, it's easy for everyone to be in four conversations at once. The cousins were laughing at something they saw on YouTube, and Nathan is not as interested in eating as much as chirping "Good yontif," to everyone he can make eye contact with.

At my mother's house none of this would have been possible, because the long table just kept getting longer, eventually becoming a T or an L depending on how many we were.

When we brought out dessert, the bakers got thumbs up on their three varieties of mandelbroit, especially from Bubbie Bella. "I can't believe," she says, "these modern girls can do everything."

It was a warm night and we all hung out on the deck drinking coffee, until it was time to disperse. When Lorlie starts helping Bubbie on with her sweater, Nathan and Delilah run over and reach up for a hug. Cory and Jamie, two nephews from my side of the family bend down to give her a kiss. "We'll come and visit this week, Bubbie," my niece Lindsay tells her, and then a chorus of, "I love you," from all of her grandchildren including anybody who feels like one. ■

Rejection of the niqab is self-defence, not racism

Barbara Kay

In her op-ed in the Oct. 8 CJN, Danielle Kubes asks why "Jews have not come out in mass support" of Ishaq Zunera, who refuses to take her citizenship unmasked.

I can't speak for other Jews, but I have long supported a niqab ban in the public sector, and I consider Kubes' alarmist fears of a slippery slope unfounded. Kubes' main points are: a) if we ban the niqab today, tomorrow it will be the kippah; b) it is of no importance that the custom of face cover is rooted in misogyny ("So what?"); and c) that Canadians' objection to the niqab in overwhelming numbers – more than 90 per cent in Quebec and 82 per cent in Canada as a whole, according to polls – is the same "hysteria" that was directed toward turban-wearing Sikhs in the RCMP in 1990.

Beginning with the last point: the Sikh turban issue was entirely situational; the debate revolved around military uniformity, and was not a rejection of the turban in principle. And nobody, for example, has ever made a political issue of the sheitel. Or the hijab. Indeed, Pauline Marois tried hard to push Quebec down the slippery slope with her charter of values 18 months ago and failed miserably. In their rejection, Quebecers made it clear they have no problem with any religious accessories.

Except one: the niqab. Not because they are Islamophobic. Face cover is not one accessory on a continuum. It is an entirely separate phenomenon, illuminated once and for all by Marois' failure to mobilize against the other accessories. Pushback against face cover has nothing to do with Islam. Canadians would consider it indecent if it was a custom amongst Zoroastrians, Raelians or atheists. Neither are identification and security concerns the real issue – they are distracting sidebars.

The niqab is a new and unique social phenomenon in the West. It arouses anxiety, and rightly so, as face cover is inimical to public health. It is a willed barrier to friendly communication, and therefore destructive to the social environment, an obstacle to the trust and social reciprocity upon which healthy communities depend. Rejection of the niqab is not racism; it is social self-defence. When there are few niqabs in one's line of sight, the issue seems trivial. When, as in France and Belgium, there are thousands, it is not trivial.

There are already limitations to the niqab in Canada. In one case, it was ruled against in court for a plaintiff, trumped by the longstanding right of a defendant to see his accuser's face. Why only accusers' faces? Most Canadians see mutual openness as a legally unarticulated, but nevertheless pressing social right. Ironically, the niqab is not permitted to lawyers in Pakistan, voters in Egypt and other countries, on the hajj in Saudi Arabia, or in universities across the Islamic world. Is that also "hysteria"?

To Kubes who seems to believe in unlimited rights on religious obligations (the niqab is only a regional custom, but I'll stipulate it for argument's sake). Do you say "so what?" to polygamy, which is a religious obligation for both men and women in offshoots of Mormonism? If not, why not? It doesn't harm you or me. Yet, most of us feel gender equality rights trump religion on this issue, and to my knowledge, nobody has ever accused those rejecting polygamy as Christophobic.

Kubes appears to willfully ignore the threatening political dimension the niqab represents. Unlike Orthodox Jewish women who have worn sheitels for centuries, it is very doubtful that Ishaq's mother wore a niqab, or even a hijab. The rise of the niqab is not only coincident with, it is politically collaborative with the rise of contemporary Islamism, a triumphalist ideology that quite openly seeks to colonize and transform western democracies.

As Pakistan-born Muslim Raheel Raza recently wrote in the Toronto Sun: "[I] never saw a niqab when I was growing up in Karachi, Pakistan… The niqab and burka have nothing to do with Islam. They're the political flags of the Muslim Brotherhood, ISIS, the Taliban, Al Qaeda and Saudi Arabia."

When a symbol is that freighted with hostility to the principles democracies stand for, it is reasonable to set limits to tolerance in the name of cultural self-preservation. Face covers alarm us for good reasons, and it is ethically legitimate to act on them. ■

Packing up after 19 years

Chaim Steinmetz

Packing up a home when you're downsizing is an unnatural task. Humans instinctively accumulate possessions and resist eliminating them. Despite consulting the best-selling advice of Marie Kondo, we find it a tough task to discard items that are theoretically essential, but practically forgotten.

Yet decisions must be made, and possessions must be relinquished. And as I stand surrounded by boxes and packing tape, it's hard not to wax philosophical and wonder: what do we really need to pack?

This question is one Jews have asked themselves multiple times while wandering in exile: what can you pack at a moment's notice? The answer was simple: pack hearts and minds. Rabbi Esriel Hildesheimer said the "guiding sentence" of the Jewish mission is: "Omnia mea mecum porto," "All my things I carry with me," – that is, that character and wisdom are the only assets of enduring value and are all you ever need. After packing up too many times to count, Jews have learned that it's not what's in your suitcases that really count, it's what you pack in your heart.

And what we pack (and unpack) in our hearts defines our lives. Zak Ebrahim, the son of El Sayid Nosair (the man who assassinated Rabbi Meir Kahane), tells of his mother's reaction when he confided that he no longer accepted his family's radical views: "She looked at me with the weary eyes of someone who had experienced enough dogmatism to last a lifetime, and said, 'I'm tired of hating people.' In that instant, I realized how much negative energy it takes to hold hatred inside of you." After a lifetime of packing their hearts with hate, Zak and his mother realized that it had weighed them down.

Zak is not unique. It's quite common for people to cling to beloved hatreds. Nelson Mandela, who was a genius at unpacking hatred, said, "Resentment is like drinking poison and then hoping it will kill your enemies." We treat old hatreds as precious possessions and let them ruin our own lives instead.

> Goodbye Montreal. I'm packing you up with me.

In place of hatred, others choose to pack their heart with love. Seth Mandell runs camps for children who've lost a family member to terror (his own son, Koby, was murdered in a terror attack in 2001). Seth told me a story about one girl who was so grief-stricken that she had begun to cut herself on the wrist. The first day of camp, her counsellor saw the girl's cut and remarked that "time heals all wounds."

The girl reacted angrily and said, "It does not," a reply that was a reference to all wounds, both psychic and physical. But the counsellor persevered in befriending the girl, and the girl had a wonderful time at camp. By the end of the camp, the girl had stopped cutting herself and the wound healed. Noticing this, the counsellor lightheartedly remarked, "I guess time does heal all wounds." The girl responded: "No, it does not… But love heals all wounds." Love is magical, and packing even more love into your heart is always a good idea.

As we pack up our house to leave Montreal, we are also packing with us inspirational memories. I'll pack the memory of the cancer patient who refused to let her disease take away her optimism. I'll pack the memory of the Holocaust survivor who was our synagogue's "candyman," determined to make the world sweet for the next generation. I'll pack the memory of the man who ran to greet each new person in the synagogue and made them feel at home. And I'll pack the memory of a Holocaust survivor who every time there was a celebration, hoisted a l'chaim with a twinkle in his eye, in a moment of personal triumph and joy.

These uplifting memories have changed me, and I will carry them with me forever.

Goodbye Montreal. I'm packing you up with me. ■

Jews are turning right, and it's not cause for rejoicing

Rabbi Dow Marmur

The German translation of Michael Hilton's 1994 book The Christian Effect on Jewish Life has the title Wie es sich christelt, so juedelt es sich – "as things go for Christians, so they go for Jews." It's an apt paraphrase of this almost untranslatable adage that reminds us of how much our Judaism, particularly the Ashkenazi (European) kind, is influenced by Christianity.

The latest report on American Jewry, recently released by the Pew Research Center, doesn't use the German-Yiddish phrase, but it conveys a similar message in describing the many similarities between Orthodox Judaism and evangelical Christianity in the United States.

Their theologies may be very different, but their sociology and politics are strikingly similar. In general, according to the Pew report, Orthodox Jews resemble white evangelical Protestants more than other Jews. Understandably, for both groups, religion is very important in their lives (over 80 per cent for Orthodox Jews, less than 20 per cent for other Jews). Some 75 per cent of both groups attend worship services regularly, whereas most non-Orthodox Jews only attend very occasionally, and some never.

Evangelicals and Orthodox Jews alike believe that Israel was given to the Jewish People by God. In their expectations of messianic intervention from Heaven, many ultra-Orthodox Jews are opposed to modern Zionism, which set out to bring freedom to Jews on earth. By contrast, the Christian Zionist movement is very strongly supportive of Israel in general and its current government in particular. This trend is now also clearly discernible in Canada.

The success of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, founded by Yechiel Eckstein, an Orthodox rabbi, is one of its many manifestations. The Fellowship is said to have raised some $1.3 billion (US) among Christians to help poor Jews in Israel and elsewhere.

And, of course, Orthodox Jews and evangelical Christians both tend to place themselves on the political right, among Republicans in the United States and Conservatives in Canada. Hence the passionate support for Prime Minister Stephen Harper and his party among Jews, particularly, but not only, the Orthodox. Their parents and grandparents were probably Communists or members of other left-wing parties.

As a consequence, the liberal manifestations of Christianity and Judaism – religiously and politically – are receding. Though a plurality of U.S. Jews still identifies as Reform and probably votes Democrat, Orthodoxy is growing. By all accounts, there are similar trends among Muslims in North America and Europe.

Sociologist Steven Cohen speaks of "the shrinking Jewish middle," because its members intermarry, marry late or not at all, and have fewer children. He anticipates, therefore, a dramatic shift in the composition of North American Jewry, reflecting the growing influence of Orthodox Judaism in the Jewish state and manifest in the clout of its Orthodox political parties.

Ironically, it's thanks to the liberal forces, particularly in the 20th century, that Jews were able not only to leave the ghetto, but also to be accepted as equals in the countries to which they came. They fled Czarist Russia and Fascist regimes in Europe because of oppression there. With time, however, they've come to identify with conservative forces in their chosen countries.

As part of the same trend, Israel has a right-wing coalition government that describes itself as national. It likes to characterize what's left of the centrist Labor Party that dominated Israel in its earlier decades as the "extreme left." The tightening grip of Orthodox political parties on Israeli society – again, as part of the government – is of the same ilk.

One of the effects of this trend may be that Jews who are neither religiously Orthodox nor politically conservative will distance themselves altogether from Judaism and the Jewish polity. The trend is there in the Diaspora through assimilation. In Israel it manifests itself through secularization, which will place many Jews on the margins of Israeli society.

Only those with a warped sense of Jewish history and Jewish destiny would rejoice. ■

Sanctions targeting Iran's human rights abuses aren't radical

Sheryl Saperia

On Sept. 23, Foreign Affairs Minister Rob Nicholson announced that the Conservatives, if re-elected, would amend the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA) to include gross human rights abuses as new grounds for Canadian sanctions against foreign states, entities and individuals. Whoever forms the next federal government should implement this sound policy to target Tehran's egregious human rights violations. It is entirely consistent with the positions of all three major federal political parties and with Canada's historical stance vis-à-vis Iran.

Many Canadians would be surprised to learn that Canada and Iran have only had full diplomatic relations for six of the last 35 years. Numerous Iranian misdeeds have accumulated to produce today's animosity. The "Canadian Caper," in which Canada orchestrated the rescue of American embassy personnel during the 1979 Iranian hostage crisis, closed the door on Canada-Iran relations for a decade. An attempt at rapprochement in the early 1990s was short lived. By 1996, Canada had introduced a "controlled engagement policy," imposing significant limitations on interactions between the two countries.

The Canadian government tightened these limitations further after the brutal torture, rape and murder of Iranian-Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi by Iranian officials in 2003. By 2005, Canadian interaction with Iran was restricted to discussions on human rights, nuclear non-proliferation, and the Kazemi case, with visits or exchanges by Iranian officials to Canada prohibited. In 2007, the two countries stopped exchanging ambassadors. In 2012, Canada suspended all diplomatic relations with Iran.

In recent years, Ottawa has taken some significant steps to curtail Iran's nuclear proliferation and sponsorship of terrorism. Measures have included imposing SEMA sanctions on Tehran for its illicit nuclear program; designating the regime as a state sponsor of terrorism under the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act; and listing Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps Qods Force as a proscribed terrorist entity.

Perhaps the broadest consensus across the three major federal parties when it comes to Iran pertains to domestic repression. For in addition to sowing death and destruction abroad, Iran boasts one of the worst human rights records at home. The Islamic Republic has the world's highest per capita execution rate, with no compunction about executing minors. Homosexuals and ethnic and religious minorities are persecuted. Journalists, lawyers, and human rights defenders are imprisoned. Women are stoned to death for adultery.

It is, therefore, fitting that Canada introduces a resolution every year on the human rights situation in Iran at the United Nations General Assembly, ensuring that the international body, which is all too often biased against liberal democracies like Israel, maintains a focus on Iran for its myriad crimes. Partnering with the Munk School of Global Affairs at the University of Toronto, the government has also been involved in assisting Iranian human rights activists to evade online censorship. However, more can, and should, be done.

In June 2014, the House of Commons subcommittee on international human rights adopted a motion with the unanimous backing of the three parties, which supported the introduction of targeted SEMA sanctions "against the major Iranian human rights violators complicit in the massive assaults on human rights." This is an idea whose time has come.

Sanctions alone will not solve the Iranian human rights problem, but they can make a difference. Economic sanctions and international condemnation generated enough pressure to bring Tehran to the negotiating table on the nuclear file. The regime must now be convinced that its human rights abuses will be closely monitored and met with a tangible response.

Iran's blatant disregard for human rights has long been at the centre of strained relations between Ottawa and Tehran. Canada should continue its decades-old leadership role in confronting Iran's ongoing crimes – no matter which party forms the next government later this month. Imposing sanctions on countries like Iran that systemically abuse the basic rights of their citizens is a morally and historically appropriate course of action. ■

Poll shows plurality of CJN readers support Tories

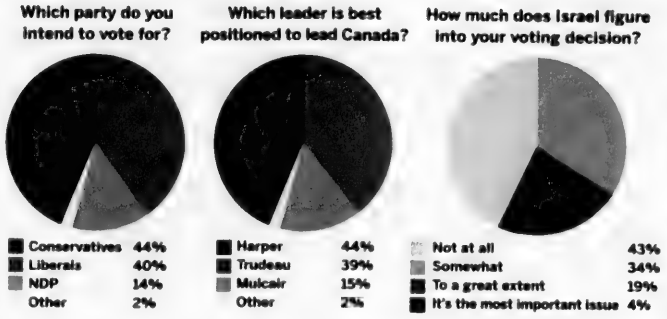
plungen@thecjn.ca



CJN readers have spoken and the results are in: a plurality believe Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the Conservative party are the leader and party of choice in the upcoming national election on Oct. 19.

Harper received 44 per cent of support in an online poll conducted between Sept. 25 and Oct. 7. Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau was second, with 39 per cent support, trailed by NDP Leader Tom Mulcair at 15 per cent.

The Conservative party mirrored its leader's result, gaining the support of 44 per cent of poll participants, edging the Liberals' 40 per cent and the NDP's 14 per cent.

Eleven hundred and nine people took part in the online poll, which asked three questions: "Which party leader do you believe is best positioned to lead Canada?"; "Which party do you intend to vote for?"; and "How much does Israel figure into your voting decision?" On the last question, 43 per cent answered "not at all," while 34 per cent responded "somewhat" and 19 per cent said "to a great extent." Another four per cent said Israel was "the most important issue," bringing the total number who said Israel played a role in their voting to 57 per cent.

Though not considered a scientific poll, the results are interesting, giving credence to the contention that the Conservative party's strong support of Israel – "through fire and water" Conservative candidates often repeat – has resonated with many Jewish voters. Liberal party and NDP candidates have also repeated their strong support of Israel throughout the campaign, particularly in ridings with substantial Jewish populations.

Nelson Wiseman, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said some of the poll results were surprising. Only 23 per cent of participants said the party's positions on Israel was an important consideration in where they placed their support, he noted.

Wiseman suggested that had the poll been taken during the last general election, the role of Israel would have been stronger and the support for the Conservatives would have been greater. At that time, the Liberals were led by Michael Ignatieff, who during Israel's war against Hezbollah, had told an audience in Quebec that Israeli actions could amount to war crimes. That contrasted sharply with the Conservative position, he said, noting that an Ipsos exit poll at the time showed Jewish support for the Conservatives at 52 per cent, higher than the national average of around 40 per cent.

Wiseman suggested that the Liberal and NDP emphasis on strong support for Israel may peel back Jewish voters who had left those parties for the Tories. He said Jews are not immune to a nationwide trend, as revealed in polls, that showed voters are eager for change. Not only will that cost the Tories votes, but it should see strategic voters, who had swung to the NDP in a bid to unseat Harper, swing back to the Liberals as a more electable opponent to the Conservatives.

The upshot is to make the re-election of Conservatives more difficult in the ridings with substantial Jewish populations, he said.

Nevertheless, he continued, "I still expect more Jewish support for the Conservatives than was the case historically."

Cjnews.com readers from across the country participated in the poll, along with small numbers in foreign locales such as the United States, Finland and even Cyprus.

The largest number of respondents came from the Greater Toronto Area, but there was also substantial participation in other large urban centres, including Ottawa, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and the Vancouver area.

The CJN poll shows that readers support Harper and the Tories in greater proportion than the general population. Recent national polls have oscillated greatly, with the Conservative and Liberal parties trading the lead in recent weeks. In some surveys, Conservative support was as high as 37 per cent and as low as 30 per cent, while the Liberals have polled between 27 per cent and 35 per cent. The New Democrats appear to have peaked at 28 per cent and are, as of Oct. 7, at around 24 per cent support.

An Oct. 7 Nanos poll had the Liberals in the lead, with 33.5 per cent, followed by the Tories at 31.6 per cent and the NDP at 24.2 per cent.

Commenting on The CJN's poll, CJN president Elizabeth Wolfe said, "Our national election poll was the first, to our knowledge, to canvass voter intentions across the Canadian Jewish community. There is always speculation as to how Jews will vote, but until now, there has been no real opportunity to test assumptions. The CJN is uniquely positioned to poll Jewish voters and to report on the results.

"This, The CJN's inaugural poll, represents a new venture for cjnews.com as the medium to gauge Canadian Jewish opinion and to create a platform for concerned Jews to consider a broad range of perspectives. We look forward to creating many opportunities to engage our readers online and to attract Canadian Jews everywhere to our digital conversation," she said. ■

Liberals, NDP, Greens debate refugee policy at shul event

sshefa@thecjn.ca

At a public election debate on Canada's response to the Syrian humanitarian crisis, and refugee policy in general, representatives from the Liberals, NDP and Greens answered questions about their parties' positions on federal health policy for refugees and the Conservatives' controversial "designated countries of origin" rule.

The Oct. 8 event, organized by Darchei Noam Congregation and the Jewish–Refugee Action Network (JRAN), was moderated by CJN editor Yoni Goldstein.

The parties were represented by Oakville North-Burlington Green candidate Adnan Shahbaz, York Centre NDP candidate Hal Berman, and Don Valley West Liberal candidate Rob Oliphant.

The Conservative party was invited to participate, but did not send a representative.

The candidates fielded questions from the audience, as well as a panel that included Darchei Noam spiritual leader Rabbi Tina Grimberg, JRAN founding member Philip Berger, and JRAN member Ron Shacter.

Adnan Shahbaz

Rob Oliphant

Hal Berman SHERI SHEFA PHOTOS

Oliphant began by explaining that there are people who are Canadians by chance, having been born here, others who are Canadians by choice – immigrants who have chosen to build a life here – and others who are "Canadians by compassion. Those are the refugees... people who have had to flee their homes as a result of war, as a result of famine, civil war, or international war and have looked for a better place of safety."

Oliphant said the "federal government has to understand that... it has a responsibility to those who are seeking asylum in Canada to ensure fair process, fair health care."

Shahbaz said he's realistic about the Green party's chances of getting elected, but promised that Green MPs would use whatever influence they have to "hold [the government's] feet to the fire in ensuring that they'll get things done."

Shahbaz said the Harper government has spent millions of dollars appealing the Federal Court's recent ruling against its policy on refugee health care funding. In 2012, the Conservative government cancelled health care for refugee claimants.

Both Shahbaz and Berman said their parties would drop the ongoing appeal if they formed the next government, saying that refugee claimants should be entitled to the same health care as Canadian citizens.

Berman, a palliative care doctor, explained that if a refugee's health care isn't covered and they come to a hospital for treatment, the hospital must foot the bill and the cost may have to be recouped from other areas, in the form of cuts to other services or longer wait times.

"We all pay for this in the end. Whether we pay with poor service, or we pay with money, that is the question," Berman said.

On the issue of abolishing the designated country of origin (DCO) policy, which was put in place to deter people from "safe" countries from applying to Canada as refugees, Berman and Shahbaz said their parties would drop the policy if elected.

"It doesn't matter where they come from. People who flee a place, if they do so legitimately… they are discriminated against in their country of origin… for religion, sexual orientation, certain practices, whatever. If someone feels that they are in danger, it doesn't matter where they come from," Berman said.

Oliphant said "there is something fundamentally wrong about this, fundamentally un-Canadian, and fundamentally contrary to everything we understand about human rights.

"What we have said is refugee determination is based on the individual's experience and their degree of safety and persecution, no matter where they are from."

> The reality is, this is four years into the largest humanitarian crisis since World War II… and we are taking baby steps

Oliphant added that until three years ago, all claimants, regardless of their country of origin, went through a rigorous process to determine their eligibility, and a Liberal government "will return [to] a sane way of dealing with refugees."

When an audience member challenged the Liberal record of accepting refugees under former Liberal prime minister Jean Chrétien, pointing out that the numbers accepted into Canada under his leadership were comparable to those under the current Conservative government, Oliphant said, "I stopped playing the numbers game… Do I think the Liberal record is absolutely perfect? Absolutely not. Do I think that if you look at the history of Canada, which governments have done a better job than others around those two issues – immigrants and refugees – I would say it's the Liberal party."

Shahbaz said the DCO policy contributes to a two-tier immigration system.

"The idea of the tier system that has been implemented in Canada … is a very dangerous and slippery slope that has started over the past few years. We need to be aware of it, and we need to fight against it," Shahbaz said.

On the subject of whether Canada is doing enough for Syrian refugees, Oliphant said, "when we saw the image of Alan Kurdi on the beach in Turkey, Canadians were horrified and woke up.

"The reality is, this is four years into the largest humanitarian crisis since World War II… and we are taking baby steps," he said, adding that the Liberals have committed to bring in 25,000 refugees before the end of this year.

Shahbaz said "this is one of those moments in history right now where we are going to be judged in the future, in how we are handling this huge crisis."

Berman said an NDP government would not impose a cap on refugees who have family sponsorship and would ensure that all have access to health care.

"Are we making enough of an effort? The answer is no… The best thing we can do to help the refugees in Syria is to elect a different government," Berman said.

"If there is trouble in the world and we are a safe haven, we need to step up."

In response to a question from a boy in the audience, Berman said that if the Conservatives win a minority on Oct. 19, Mulcair would work with Trudeau's Liberals, because "Harper is the worst threat to Canada that we face right now – even greater than ISIS." ■

Cultural and religious issues dominate as election day nears

Daniel Wolgelerenter

Thank God for the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP). I say that not because trade is an inherently Jewish issue, nor because I know for certain the recently negotiated deal will be good for Canada, especially since its details have yet to be released.

Irrespective of its long-term effects, the TPP might be our only hope to reorient electoral discussions toward an issue – the economy – that actually affects the well-being of large numbers of Canadians.

If so, it will offer a change from the debates that have dominated the campaign for the last month or so.

Barely seven weeks ago, news photos of little Alan Kurdi's dead body provoked a (perhaps overdue) groundswell of concern for the four million refugees created by Syria's brutal civil war. The sudden surge of interest blindsided the governing Conservatives, whose reaction was seen in many quarters as hard-hearted.

It seemed the issue might sink the Tories, especially in the wake of shaky economic numbers (which have since improved), as well as scandals and polls suggesting an appetite for change.

But they've since regained their footing. In addition to standing firm on the refugee file, they've connected with large numbers of Canadians on the issues of revoking the naturalized citizenship of convicted terrorists; wearing a niqab at citizenship swearing-in ceremonies and a proposed ban on them in the public service; and a pledge to set up a phone line for people to report "barbaric cultural practices."

The moves have stabilized, and perhaps even improved, Conservative polling numbers without requiring costly election promises.

To start, they refused to alienate their base by retreating from their cautious – or what some call xenophobic – position on the Syrian crisis. Meanwhile, sympathetic news outlets have suggested that the wave of Syrian refugees has been compromised by Islamist infiltrators intent on bringing sharia law to the West, and that many of the refugees aren't even Syrian.

Around the same time, they caught a break when the Federal Court of Appeal upheld a lower court ruling that the government's 2011 ban on niqabs – full face veils – at citizenship oath ceremonies was "unlawful." The ban affected a tiny number of women – two since 2011 – who have tried to take the oath with their faces covered (after having their identities confirmed in private), but the ruling gave the party an opening to raise the issue.

Polls say the Conservative position is popular with a large majority of the electorate, especially in Quebec, where it appears to be moving votes from the NDP to the Tories and Bloc Québécois.

Then came word the government wanted to revoke the citizenship of a Canadian-born Muslim man with dual Pakistani citizenship (allegedly through his naturalized, Pakistani-born Canadian parents) who was convicted in a terror plot to bomb targets in southern Ontario.

Finally, last week, the party announced plans for the "barbaric cultural practices" hotline, while Prime Minister Stephen Harper himself pushed the niqab issue further when he proposed the public service ban in a CBC interview.

When the Parti Québécois proposed banning head coverings for civil servants in Quebec in 2013, Jews led opposition to the idea, even though it was a thinly veiled swipe at Muslims.

This time, some Jews are actively supporting a similar idea from the federal Tories, though most are standing idly by. (A grassroots group led by prominent Jews in Toronto is a notable exception.)

As many Muslim commentators have pointed out, the niqab is anti-woman and not mandated by Islamic law. But some Jews might find themselves in the hard-to-defend position of having denounced one proposal, but not the other.

Jews may also find it odd to criticize a woman's decision – taken "freely" or not – to wear any article of clothing when modesty requirements for observant Jewish women, though perhaps less obtrusive than face veils, are similarly seen as oppressive, sometimes even by fellow Jews.

Harper himself spoke out, albeit mildly, against the PQ's charter of values, though he now praises a niqab ban for civil servants being proposed by Quebec's current Liberal government.

As for the hotline, we can only hope that no one calls about the "barbaric" practices of Jewish ritual slaughter and circumcision, or "oppressive" arranged marriages among haredim.

The TPP may ultimately change the channel on this debate, but even if it doesn't, we'll soon find out whether the Conservatives have played their hand just right on these cultural issues, or showed their cards too early. ■

Contested Mount Royal race nearing the end

jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

When Robert Libman made known his intention to seek the Conservative nomination in Mount Royal in the summer of 2014 he did so with the conviction that Jewish voters are so grateful to Stephen Harper that their support would be enough wrest the riding from the Liberals after 75 years.

He believed Harper and his government's unwavering backing of Israel and strong stand against anti-Semitism and terrorism since 2006 would be enough to bridge the 2,200-vote gap between the Liberals and the Tories in Mount Royal in the 2011 federal election.

Analyses of the polls that year and anecdotal evidence indicated that a majority of Jews, historically solidly Liberal, voted Conservative. Liberal Irwin Cotler's once 90 per cent-plus ballot share declined to less than 42 per cent.

With the highly respected Cotler exiting politics after 16 years, it has been widely thought that even more Jews would switch to the Tories this time around.

And Libman is a strong candidate. Older voters especially remember him as the 20-something upstart who founded the English-rights protest Equality Party and led it to four seats in the National Assembly in 1989. He upset the Liberals in D'Arcy McGee, the "Jewish" provincial riding that had always been Liberal.

He is a former Côte St. Luc mayor (as well as Hampstead and Montreal West during the merger) and was a member of Montreal's executive committee with expertise in urban planning.

The Conservative party has made clear that it believes it can make a breakthrough in Mount Royal (it currently holds five Quebec seats, none in the Montreal area.) Harper's first stop on the very day the writ was dropped on Aug. 2 was at the YM-YWHA, in Mount Royal.

During the High Holidays, large Conservative posters wishing Jews a Shanah Tovah were put up near 10 synagogues. They bore a photo of Harper at the Western Wall and quoted the prime minister from his 2014 address to the Knesset: "Through fire and water, Canada will stand with Israel."

Despite an aggressive campaign, Libman, 54, is not coasting to victory. Liberal candidate Anthony Housefather, who launched his nomination bid back in March 2014, has been a tenacious opponent.

The poll-aggregating site ThreeHundredEight.com projected on Oct. 7 an 81 per cent likelihood that the Liberals will win Mount Royal. The Liberals are averaging 51 per cent support, the Conservatives 35.5 per cent and the New Democrats, whose candidate is Mario Jacinto Rimbao, 9.7 per cent among decided voters.

Rimbao, who is prominent in the politically active Filipino community, remains the wild card depending on how many votes he can pull away from the leading contenders, who both are making special pitches to that community.

Rimbao also has his Jewish supporters, notably the NDP riding association president Jimmy Gutman, who says he is drawn to the party for ideological reasons. Harper's support for Israel is more about backing the policies of Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, than about genuine concern for what's best for the people of Israel, in his opinion.

Libman refuted a Mainstreet/Postmedia poll published Sept. 24 showing Housefather had a 15-point lead over him. Libman claims the poll was a "sham" because Mainstreet is run by Quito Maggi, a Liberal party organizer and former Liberal party president.

"It's a bogus poll and contradicted by our hard numbers, which show a very close race in Mount Royal," he emailed The CJN. "The Liberals did the same thing in the last election where they targeted specific sectors of the riding only where their support was strong... They are spinning numbers to create a false impression."

While Libman has emphasized that only the Conservatives assure "unequivocal" support for Israel, Housefather recognized from the outset that Mount Royal is culturally diverse. About a third of its electors are Jewish, but their traditionally higher than average turnout may give that figure extra weight.

Housefather, 45, the current mayor of Côte St. Luc, has cultivated support among the many different ethnic groups in the riding, many of them visible minorities – which traditionally have been Liberal.

GUEST VOICE

We should only welcome people who actually need help

Donald Carr

For the past several years, millions of people have fled Syria, survivors of the barrel bombs and other vicious assaults by Syrian President Bashar Assad's forces and by the many independent rebel warlords in that country's civil war. Until recently, there had been a few references from time to time to the situation in the western press. The United Nations called for funding. The western response was feeble. There was no response from wealthy Arab states.

These wanderers are far from homogenous. In addition to Sunni Muslims, Shia Muslims and Alawis, they include Druze, Kurds and members of several different Christian sects. Over time, they have been joined by Yazidis and other ethnic groups escaping from barbarous fundamentalists such as the Islamic State (ISIS), Al Qaeda and Al Nusra. Many of them were unable to seek refuge in camps set up in Jordan, Turkey and Lebanon, because they were persecuted minorities, fearful of the reaction of the camps' inhabitants. (One has to be thankful that no Jews were left in Syria to suffer a worse fate.)

Suddenly, within the last few weeks, faced with the image of a lone child washed up on a beach or moved by pictures of dispossessed masses clamouring at barbed-wire fences in Hungary, Serbia and Croatia, the West's conscience has awakened.

In Canada, the urge to be hosts to "Syrian refugees" is now not only acceptable, but, to many, an imperative. Among these activated groups are synagogues and rabbis who have joined in the chorus to raise funds for, and to sponsor the resettlement of, "Syrian refugees" here. Several have, amazingly and quite inappropriately, likened the current situation to that of the Shoah, when so many countries – including Canada – shunned our hapless people.

In their plea for funds and sponsorship, little attention has been paid to who these "Syrian refugees" include, or to distinguishing the true refugees from those who are part of the infiltration into the masses by members of ISIS, Syria's secret police, Assad's army, or their thousands of willing co-operators. No concern is being shown for their inevitable demand that the host countries adopt sharia law. Nobody is asking why recent news clips show primarily able-bodied and healthy-looking young men and few women, elderly or infirm people.

> Little attention has been paid to who these 'Syrian refugees' include

In a recent meeting, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) wisely proposed to the king of Jordan that attempts be made in Canada to provide aid and funding to assist in looking after true refugees from Syria in his country, rather than support their wholesale acceptance in Canada or elsewhere.

Recklessly rushing to avoid a misplaced sense of guilt – a familiar Jewish trait – that we will be accused of doing what was done to refugees from the Shoah, as well as not seeking the facts or being oblivious to them, is plainly wrong.

Relief and haven should be tendered to those who are truly refugees. A home should be provided and sponsorship offered to those who will not be intent on influencing their host countries into adopting sharia law, to those who are not "plants" by vicious fundamentalists intent on founding a new caliphate here, and to those who do not have blood of the innocents on their hands.

Let's first welcome Yazidis, Christians, Druze, Kurds and those other persecuted minorities who can clearly demonstrate their innocence and their intention to live harmoniously with their Canadian neighbours-to-be. ■

GUEST VOICE

The time to act on the crisis is now

By Mitchell Goldberg and Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld

Images of three-year-old Alan Kurdi's body washed ashore evoke a special resonance for Jews. We know all too well the horrors of persecution and being shunned by the world. That is why Canadian Jewry has always been at the forefront of refugee protection. We are proud that Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) has stepped up to the plate and synagogues across Canada are beginning the process of submitting private sponsorships for Syrians.

Last year, the Jewish Refugee Action Network (JRAN) and the Canadian Association of Refugee Lawyers (CARL) joined many faith and human rights groups in calling upon the government to create special measures for Syrian refugees. Yet the government did nothing for the Syrian Canadians staggering under the lengthy processing delays for family reunification applications, sticking instead with its modest plan to resettle 10,000 Syrians over three years.

Over the past few weeks there have been a range of numbers introduced by the government to justify its approach to the refugee crisis. Here is the number that matters: zero.

Zero is the number of new refugee resettlement places created by Canada since the Syrian civil war began. All we have done is require that many of Canada's existing resettlement spots shift from other countries toward Syrians. That's bad news if you're fleeing violence in Congo, Sudan or Eritrea.

Faced with five million Syrian refugees and 20 million refugees globally, our government's response has been to play tricks with statistics and claim credit for things it has not done.

While mayors, premiers, former cabinet ministers, prime ministers, faith groups, opposition parties and the majority of Canadians clamour for the current government to muster the political will to act, zero is also the number of times that the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has spoken up.

Recently, CIJA missed yet another opportunity to act when it dispatched a memo to its members listing web links for private sponsorships, mentioning its plan to donate funds to the Kingdom of Jordan for refugee relief work, and playing number games with Canada's refugee resettlement program for Syrians and Iraqis.

> Our government's response has been to play tricks with statistics and claim credit for things it has not done.

CIJA's failure to call for meaningful government action for Syrian refugees compounds its near silence on the government's recent cuts to refugee health care and the discriminatory inland refugee determination process, even after both enactments were struck down by the Federal Court.

Is the government right to severely restrict the numbers of refugees given the security threats of jihadists? Once upon a time, our governments brandished the security threat of "trouble-making Jews" as an excuse for its anti-Semitic refugee policies. Today, security experts tell us that we simply need to put in place the resources to conduct quick but robust security screening.

We've accomplished this in every major humanitarian crisis since World War II. Only a lack of political will prevents us from succeeding again.

A crisis as large as what happened to the little boy in that photo requires a willingness to speak truth to power and put partisanship aside. It is not too late for CIJA to remember that "we were all slaves in Egypt." And it's not too late for the government to recall that we are all "our brother's keepers."

The time to act is now. ■

Letter sets out Jewish case against niqab citizenship ban

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

More than 120 prominent members of the Jewish community have issued a public letter affirming their support for Muslim women who choose to wear a face covering during citizenship swearing-in ceremonies and in other public venues.

The letter, published last week in the Globe and Mail, attacks Prime Minister Stephen Harper for unleashing "bigotry and xenophobia against an entire group in Canadian society," and it cites Canadian values and the historic experience of Jews as motivation for taking a stand against "the dangers of scapegoating and victimization.

"Observing one's faith in a way that harms no others is not at odds with Canadian values. It is the essence of Canadian values. So is gender equality. We wish our government had some credibility in speaking on this matter," the letter states.

Myer Siemiatycki, a professor of politics and public administration at Ryerson University, said the letter was drafted, distributed and printed within a 24-hour span. It was sent to members of three Toronto synagogues – Holy Blossom Temple, Darchei Noam Congregation and the Danforth Jewish Circle. The recipients in turn passed it along and within a day, 125 people had signed it.

"The point was to offer a Jewish voice in this debate and to say the stigmatizing and vilification of a religion is abhorrent, particularly to Jews," Siemiatycki said.

The letter was written from a perspective informed by Jewish history, where Jews were often targeted as a religious minority and suffered "painful stigmatization... We know what that feels like from our history," he said.

Siemiatycki said the Conservatives had fastened on the niqab issue for crass political motives to win votes in the current election campaign. He rejected poll results that suggest a large majority of Canadians support banning the niqab in citizenship ceremonies.

The issue, Siemiatycki said, was a matter of religious rights that are protected by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. These rights cannot by removed even if a majority wants to, he said, adding such a move could open the door to further abridgments of religious rights that could one day target Jews.

Siemiatycki called the controversy over the niqab "a phony war," since only two women out of 700,000 people who've gone through the citizenship ceremony have worn it – and only after revealing their identities in private to female officers.

Ryerson professor Myer Siemiatycki says the Tories are playing politics with rights.

> The point was to offer a Jewish voice in this debate and to say the stigmatizing and vilification of a religion is abhorrent, particularly to Jews.

Nancy Ruth, one of the signatories, said, "I feel strongly about a person's freedom of choice and the right to display that choice – as long as it does not infringe upon the rights of others, nor incite hatred toward others."

Harold Troper, a professor at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, said "everyone should be offended by the effort to turn Canadian against Canadian, to use ethnic, religious prejudice as a way of getting votes.

"Jews should be especially offended by this. Jews should be very sensitive and concerned about a state that would use religious prejudice to political effect," he said. ■

Muslim activist addresses Canadian niqab debate

JODIE SHUPAC

Former U.S. senator Joe Lieberman was the keynote speaker at Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center's State of the Union dinner. JODIE SHUPAC PHOTO

Both from a political and a religious perspective, during any "identity-sensitive" situation, a person should be expected to show his or her face, British Muslim activist and author Maajid Nawaz said during the question-and-answer portion of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies' State of the Union Dinner.

He was responding to moderator and Canadian journalist Evan Solomon's request that he comment on the Canadian government's attempts to ban women from taking a citizenship oath while wearing a niqab.

Held Oct. 7 at the Eglinton Grand in Toronto and attended by about 350 people, the event's purpose was to explore critical issues facing western democracies.

"Even in Saudi Arabia, does any woman have her face uncovered in her passport photo? They all do," Nawaz added.

His comment elicited a crash of applause from the audience.

The co-founder of Quilliam, a London-based think tank focused on counter-extremism, and author of the 2012 memoir Radical: My Journey out of Islamist Extremism, Nawaz and former U.S. senator and vice-presidential nominee Joe Lieberman were the evening's speakers.

Before Lieberman's keynote address, Nawaz spoke about his transformation from a disenfranchised and radicalized Muslim youth to an outspoken critic of Islamist extremism.

As a young man, he became a member of the radical Islamist group Hizb ut-Tahrir and was imprisoned in Egypt from 2001 to 2006, renouncing his Islamist past upon his release.

The constant racism and exclusion he experienced as a teenager in the United Kingdom largely contributed to his becoming radicalized, he said, emphasizing that integration into the wider culture of a country is key to thwarting extremism in Muslim communities.

He said Canada should heed this, especially as it deals with an influx of immigrants and refugees from the Middle East.

During the question period, Solomon didn't explain that Zunera Ishaq, the Pakistani woman who took the government to court for insisting she remove her niqab during the public swearing-in ceremony, had agreed when applying for citizenship in 2013 that she would unveil herself to an official in private before taking the citizenship test, but wanted to keep it on while taking her oath.

The CJN asked Nawaz if he supports the ban even though the Conservative government has said it proposed it not as a security measure per se, but because wearing the niqab during the ceremony is an affront to Canadian values.

He replied, "I say as a Muslim that there are no religious reasons for not removing the face veil in the face of the law of a country that requires you to do so in specific situations. I don't subscribe to the French model of banning it on the streets."

He stressed, however, "I'm aware this [issue] has become a bit of a political football in Canada, and I don't want my comments to be used by either side politically."

Lieberman's speech focused on the way the Jewish community's standing has shifted in the United States during his lifetime.

Though he grew up in what he called "the shadow of the Holocaust," Lieberman said, he also came of age in the United States during a period of immense optimism, openness and growth, where he didn't feel he had to assimilate in order to be considered "a good American."

Being an observant Jew never stopped him from being elected as a state senator, attorney general and Democratic nominee for vice-president in the 2000 election, he said.

He went on to describe how the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe, the existential threat Iran poses to Israel and anti-Israel sentiment on many university campuses make him wonder if "history is turning against us."

To make sure it doesn't, Lieberman said, we as Jews have to stand up and fight for change wherever possible.

He also addressed Islamist extremism, noting that Jews must rise to the defence of Muslims and build bridges with the wider Muslim world, understanding that the extremists in their midst are a minority.

Still, he said, a small number of people can "do terrible damage to values we hold dear," adding that we must ensure young people aren't, as Nawaz was, drawn into extremist groups. ■

THE CANADIAN JEWISH NEWS
OCTOBER 15, 2015

Harper: 'We will not tolerate the singling out of Israel'

Things like the ability to share information on security threats among themselves, to take down recruitment websites, to make sure that it's basically a crime to spread terrorism or the advocacy of terrorism. So we've moved forward on a lot of fronts.

We're also investing in anti-radicalization programs. Of course, a big difference between now and, say, a number of years ago, is we're now actively engaged in Iraq and Syria in the fight against the so-called Islamic State, which obviously presents a pretty grave threat to the security of Canada and our allies.

The CJN: What is your view of the Iran deal? If you are elected prime minister, how would you go about trying to influence change in Tehran's behaviour? What is Canada's role to play on this issue?

Harper: Our allies have concluded an agreement with Iran on its nuclear program that is designed to make sure Iran respects international norms, doesn't develop a weapon and that we avoid some kind of a military confrontation around this. All we can do, I think, is, essentially, congratulate our allies on their best efforts.

I don't mind saying that we maintain a fair degree of skepticism about Iran, about whether it will adhere to the terms of this agreement. But, we'll judge Iran by its actions, not by its words.

We will continue to raise concerns about Iran's broader destabilizing agenda – not just its nuclear weapons program, but its systematic, extreme violations of human rights, its trends for violence around the region, its ongoing threats to the State of Israel. We consider these things pretty serious issues, and so a big difference between us and the Liberal party is that we are certainly not going to rush to normalize relations with Iran when it takes these kinds of positions in the world.

The CJN: Where does the Conservative party stand on Israel, and the balance between security for the Jewish state and peace with the Palestinians?

Harper: Our position has always been that we need to have a negotiated two-state solution, where we have two states living in harmony that are both peaceful and secure and democratic. We think that unilateral actions to try to attain recognition for a Palestinian state are unjustified – we generally are not for unilateral actions on either side.

But under this government, Canada has taken a very strong and, frankly unfortunately, unique stand in the international community that we will not tolerate or go along with the singling out of Israel for blame in the problems of the Middle East. It's just not true and not justified. And this government will continue to stand by the one, strong western democracy and ally that we have in that region.

The CJN: Where do you stand on the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement?

Harper: These movements to boycott Israel, obviously we denounce them. They are based on a systematic policy of trying to single out and blame Israel in a way that is simply not justified if you look at the records of other countries in the region.

> This government will continue to stand by the one, strong, western democracy in that region.

And, frankly, I find a lot of it rooted in a hatred of Israel and a not very well disguised anti-Semitism that this party absolutely will have nothing to do with.

The CJN: Poverty is an important issue for the Jewish community. What would your government do to help alleviate poverty in Canada?

Harper: We've taken a whole lot of measures. I'm pleased to see that we are not only one of the few advanced economies that has been able to grow over the past 10 years with all this global economic uncertainty, but we've actually seen growth in all income levels, including the lowest levels.

We brought in a number of measures, like Universal Childcare Benefits and the biggest increase to the Guaranteed Income Supplement for our poor seniors in a quarter-century. We've done a lot of things to try and make sure that people, including those at the lowest income levels, have more [money] in their pockets.

And, of course, our biggest single agenda is to make sure we have a program that will create jobs going forward so that people have opportunity.

The CJN: Finally, what is your message to Jewish voters across this country?

Harper: I have the same broad message to all Canadians, which is we are in an unstable global economy, and the only party that has a realistic plan to grow this economy and create jobs is the Conservative party. The other parties' plans are based on out-of-control spending that would be financed by tax hikes that would hurt our economy and, in the case of the Liberals, by deficits, which means they can't really pay for the things they are promising people.

We're laying out a series of measures, whether it's the home renovation tax credit, [tax] cuts for small business, more help for single seniors, enhancements to registered education savings plans – the things we are laying out are all things we can afford without raising taxes and while balancing our budget. These are the things that create jobs. So, we ask people to think about the big choice, which is our plan – low taxes, balanced budgets, more jobs – or on the other side, higher taxes, permanent deficits and fewer jobs.

To Jewish voters, specifically, I think there is one party, and, frankly, one government in the world, that has been very consistent in our support for the State of Israel of the Jewish People, and standing up absolutely unconditionally and consistently against anti-Israel and anti-Semitic views.

And that is the Conservative Party of Canada. It's a matter of principle for us, and we will continue to do that. ■

This interview has been edited and condensed for style and clarity.

Trudeau: 'I am opposed to the BDS movement'

And that's where we agree with Mr. Harper's approach on Bill C-51, in terms of the elements in it that actually increase security in direct and meaningful ways for Canadians.

But we disagree in that they didn't go far enough to bring in proper and robust oversight by parliamentarians of our national security agencies, for example. So what we're committed to doing is what our Five Eyes allies all do (Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States), which is create a committee of parliamentarians to ensure that our security agencies and police are respecting peoples' rights and freedoms – but at the same time are doing everything they can to keep Canadians safe.

> I think that it's an example of the new form of anti-Semitism in the world

Mr. Harper doesn't think elected parliamentarians should be doing that.

The CJN: What is your view of the Iran deal? If you are elected prime minister, how would you go about trying to influence change in Tehran's behaviour? What is Canada's role to play on this issue?

Trudeau: We have to realize that a nuclear-armed Iran is a threat not just to the region, but to global stability and security, and is absolutely unacceptable. The international community needs to do everything it can to ensure that Iran does not develop nuclear weapons. And that's why we take the P5+1 deal as a good step in the right direction – one that obviously needs to be carefully and closely monitored to ensure that it is having the necessary impact.

But I think we're still a long way from Iran actually being able to rejoin in any meaningful sense the community of nations. It's not just a challenge of its nuclear ambitions, it's a challenge around state-sponsored terrorism throughout the Middle East and beyond, and as well the complete disregard for human rights within their own country.

The CJN: Where does the Liberal party stand on Israel, and the balance between security for the Jewish state and peace with the Palestinians?

Trudeau: We feel that the only way to achieve peace in this situation is a two-state solution of a secure, democratic, stable Israel alongside a secure, democratic, stable Palestinian state. And the way to achieve that is direct negotiations between the two parties.

It's a process that is hindered by unilateral actions by either side, and we need to ensure that we are moving toward that two-state solution in a meaningful and responsible way.

The CJN: Where do you stand on the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement?

Trudeau: I'm opposed to the BDS movement. I think that it's an example of the new form of anti-Semitism in the world, as Irwin Cotler points out, an example of the three "Ds": demonization of Israel, delegitimization of Israel, and double standard applied toward Israel.

I'm all for freedom of speech and expression in Canada, and we need to be sure we're defending that. But when Canadian university students are feeling unsafe on their way to classes because of BDS or Israel Apartheid Week, that just goes against Canadian values. And I have said so, not just in news interviews, but in person on university campuses.

The CJN: Poverty is an important issue for the Jewish community. What would your government do to help alleviate poverty in Canada?

> The Combined Jewish Appeal...has shown extraordinary leadership in addressing the needs of so many people struggling to make ends meet within the Jewish community.

Trudeau: First of all, even though it's not always seen and addressed, the Combined Jewish Appeal and other initiatives have shown extraordinary leadership in addressing the needs of so many people struggling to make ends meet within the Jewish community, and across communities.

The Liberal party is committed to helping people living in poverty in Canada. We are offering a more generous Canada Child Benefit than what Mr. Harper offers – and the reason we're able to do that is we are going to be stopping the sending of government cheques to millionaire families just because they have children. Instead, we are going to be more generous to families in the middle class and particularly low-income families. And that initiative has been studied by the Library of Parliament and we will be lifting 315,000 kids out of poverty by giving, for example, a cheque to a low-income family for a kid under six of $533 a month, tax-free.

We're going to be increasing the Guaranteed Income Supplement for low-income, single seniors by 10 per cent. That's an extra $920 every year for our most vulnerable seniors. So this is something we are doing concretely to help address the crippling poverty that far too many of our seniors are facing.

The CJN: Finally, what is your message to Jewish voters across this country?

Trudeau: My pitch is primarily, an economic one. For 10 years, Mr. Harper has delivered the worst growth rate of any prime minister since the 1930s and the Great Depression. He has had the worst record on job creation of any prime minister since World War II. He has continued to give tax breaks and benefits to the wealthiest Canadians, while leaving middle-class Canadians to fall further behind. And that is the real change we are focusing on bringing.

Specifically for the Jewish community, we have to be very alert to a government that is choosing to use the politics of division and fear as blithely as Mr. Harper has been. Whether it's on the niqab issue, whether it's around citizenship issues, Mr. Harper never resists an opportunity to play with wedges and exacerbate fears instead of showing the kind of leadership that allays fears and brings people together.

And the primary example for me on this is that the Liberal party is of the opinion that it is a good thing in Canada that all major parties, and all potential prime ministers, support Israel. The fact that this prime minister has chosen to make support for Israel a domestic wedge issue is not good, either for Canada or for the Jewish community. ■

Mulcair: 'We have a plan to deal with radicalization'

People are looking at us differently. They're very demanding in terms of asking us to show our numbers and how our plan differs from those of Mr. Harper and Mr. Trudeau.

But, as I say, the week started in southwestern Ontario with a tremendous reception. Yesterday, we were in B.C., and, again, things are going super-well for the NDP in British Columbia. And today, I'm in Edmonton. I had a great reception at the Assembly of First Nations. I couldn't be prouder of that.

The CJN: When it comes to domestic security, what will your party do to ensure the security of Canadians?

Mulcair: I'll give you a concrete example. We were in Surrey, B.C., a couple of weeks ago, where we're running a man named Garry Begg, who is a former very high-level RCMP officer, a superintendent in the area, and he represents our understanding that communities like Surrey are very concerned about policing issues.

In Surrey, in one three-month period in the spring, there were 30 shootings. So we've got a plan to bring in 2,500 police officers across the country. We have a plan, also, to start dealing with radicalization, which we know is a real source of concern. But there's nothing on deradicalization in Stephen Harper's Bill C51.

And I also think that we have to have a clear plan for combating anti-Semitism. And we know that we've had different attacks on synagogues in my hometown of Montreal over the years. This is something that I personally intend to see to.

The CJN: What is your view of the Iran deal? If you are elected prime minister, how would you go about trying to influence change in Tehran's behaviour? What is Canada's role to play on this issue?

Mulcair: I think we need to take a very strong stance that this deal has to be enforced rigorously. There's absolutely no room for mistake.

I know that Iran's nuclear ambitions pose a real and present danger, not only to regional peace and security but to global peace and security. I read about Iran's horrible anti-Semitic statements. I know who I'm dealing with.

But at the same time, the agreement reached by the P5 +1 (countries) does show that if you apply yourself and you believe in getting results, you can achieve that through diplomatic channels. So after decades of hostility, there's some hope that we can reign in nuclear ambitions in Iran.

> I also think that we have to have a clear plan for combating anti-Semitism.

But again, we have to take a very tough approach on enforcement.

The CJN: Where does the NDP stand on Israel, and the balance between security for the Jewish state and peace with the Palestinians?

Mulcair: I think that Canada can and should be playing a role. I think that a Canada that is respected on the world stage can play a more positive role, if asked to do so, in the region.

Israel and Palestine have to be two states that would live in peace and security, with established and negotiated borders. The NDP has for a long time called to work with our partners for peace in the Middle East, with a safe country for Israelis and a safe country for Palestinians.

We also know, as I've always said, that it has to be within a framework of international law and United Nations resolution.

The CJN: Where do you stand on the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement?

Mulcair: I think it's absurd, and I disagree with it. Our focus is achieving real progress in the peace process – lifting countries in this region up, not putting Israel down.

The CJN: Poverty is an important issue for the Jewish community. What would your government do to help alleviate poverty in Canada?

Last major Hadassah Bazaar being held in London Nov.1

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The last major one-day Hadassah Bazaar in Canada will hold its final sale Nov. 1, a victim, like similar events elsewhere, of changing demographics and modern retailing trends.

London, Ont.'s Hadassah-WIZO Bazaar will end a 55-year run, during which it served as a focal point for breaking down barriers not just among people in the city's Jewish community, but among the wider London population as well.

"This crossed all lines," said founding chair Judy Goldberg.

Goldberg and other organizers weren't sure why London's event has outlasted other bazaars, including those in Kitchener and Toronto, which both closed over the past decade. Montreal and Vancouver also once had bazaars that raised millions of dollars for Jewish women's and children's causes – such as schools, daycares and hospitals – in Canada and Israel.

But the fact London is smaller, relatively tight knit, and somewhat removed from larger centres like Toronto helped created an event to which the entire community was drawn.

"Our customers weren't just Jewish customers," Goldberg said.

Goldberg, originally from Montreal, brought the Hadassah experience with her. In turn, the wider community learned about Jewish culture in many of its manifestations.

"We didn't have the bakeries that there are in Toronto and Montreal," she said. "This was novel. This was an education process as well, for not only our Jewish people, but for the entire community."

The event was so popular that even a bus strike didn't prevent people from showing up in droves. In its early years, the bazaar was something unique in a city that was less multicultural than it is today.

"In the middle of the night before the bazaar, we had a car go up to Toronto and get a 100-dozen bagels, because nobody knew what a bagel was in London," Goldberg laughed.

Organizers of the then-12-hour event even brought in big-name entertainers, such as CBC-TV's Juliette, a national star from the 1950s to the 1970s.

"Hadassah really put the Jewish community on the map with its bazaar," she said.

The event also had something of a small-town feel. One member, for example, had an apple orchard and donated 100 bushel baskets, which sold out. "We did a lot of homespun things. It dropped the barriers," she said.

Volunteer Paula Zaifman, pictured selling crafts in 2014, has worked at every bazaar since the event's inception.

While the fact this is the last bazaar makes her feel "sad," Goldberg was realistic about societal changes that have brought this about. They include the fact people can now buy used clothing at Goodwill and Value Village, as well as at pop-up stores, and that major department store have sales throughout the year.

"Everything in life changes," she said. "It fulfilled the goals that we had established, and then you have to move on."

Those staffing the event were also getting older, said volunteer recruiter Judy Silver. But she was happy to report that there is still one booth "that's managed completely by younger people, so that's exciting."

Silver also said newer sale items will be donated like they have been in the past, including Teva Naot footwear.

The bazaar was once so big that it was held at London's Western Fair Grounds. It later moved to Northland Mall, and finally about 10 years ago, it shrunk in size and found a home at the London Jewish Community Centre.

"It's on a much smaller scale than it was," said Michelle Bottner, president of the local Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) council. Nevertheless, "it's a pretty big undertaking."

Bottner said the group used to have a donated warehouse where people could bring goods for sale months in advance of the bazaar.

But when Nov. 1 rolls around this year, there will still be plenty of sale items, along with a popular on site restaurant featuring latkes, blintzes, bagels with lox and cream cheese, and matzah ball soup.

The final bazaar doesn't necessarily mean the permanent end of a Hadassah event at this time of year. "It doesn't mean that we're not going to ever bring back some sort of incarnation of it," Bottner said. ■

Refurbished memorial draws 600 to Shoah event

SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some 600 people gathered in Earl Bales Park Oct. 4 for the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's annual Yizkor service and the unveiling of the society's vastly refurbished Holocaust memorial site.

An array of political figures and diplomatic representatives from 10 countries were in attendance for the moving service. Greetings on behalf of the federal government were brought by Finance Minister Joe Oliver, who repeated earlier pledges that the Conservatives have "zero tolerance" for anti-Semitism.

Holocaust survivor Thomas Hecht of Montreal recounted his rescue by Aristides de Sousa Mendes, a gentile who served as Portugal's wartime consul-general in Bordeaux, France and defied orders by issuing some 20,000 protective visas to Jewish refugees.

Today, de Sousa Mendes is designated as Righteous Among the Nations, one of 25,000 or so gentiles so recognized by Yad Vashem.

The service paid tribute not only to the Holocaust's victims, but also to partisans, Allied governments, ghetto fighters and the Righteous Among the Nations, who are represented by a wall that lists 50 nations from which the heroes originated, and their flags. The awards were handed out to the founders of the original memorial site and to the sponsors of the new features, who later unveiled those elements.

What began in 1991 as a towering, flame-topped bronze obelisk designed by sculptor Ernest Raab and some markers has spread out to a two-acre site that now holds eight curved commemorative walls, memorial gardens and several smaller pillars and monuments.

One of the central new additions is a memorial to David Smuschkowitz, a one-time partisan fighter who helped found the Canadian society. He died in 2011.

In all, the two-year fundraising campaign yielded some two dozen new features at the site.

The site "is a place where the community at large, educators and their students, and people of all faiths can come to remember the past, reflect on the legacy of the Holocaust, and recommit to a better future," remarked Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"Today, more than ever, this site is of utmost importance to this community, to this city, and to this province. We hope that all educators who are in charge of teaching history to our children come to this site as part of their curriculum, so that no one can say that they were ignorant of the Holocaust and didn't know what Auschwitz was," Sonshine added.

Among the highlights is a wall in memory of the 1.5 million Jewish children murdered in the Shoah. It features the names of 365 children who perished, each of whose birthdates corresponds to one calendar day. A Canadian child celebrating a bar or bat mitzvah and a child who perished in the Holocaust can be "twinned" based on their common birthdates, as part of the Yad Vashem Twinning Program. ■

Jewish men among thousands awaiting kidney donors

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Zac Zenith

Paul Jacobs

Zac Zenith, a Calgary mortgage broker, needs a kidney donor for a transplant.

Paul Jacobs of Toronto, who is known in the legal and business community, needs a live kidney donation.

Zenith and Jacobs are two of thousands of Canadians, many of them on dialysis, who require a kidney transplant.

When patients are diagnosed with kidney disease, their renal health-care team will help them navigate the process of potentially being put on a transplant list.

Zenith and his wife, Amber, have two children. He was diagnosed with an autoimmune chronic disease called focal segmental glomerulosclerosis (FSGS), and for the past 13 years, his kidney function has dropped significantly. He is now close to having kidney failure, he says.

"I am a hands-on father. My family is my life, and my wish is for their good health and happiness with me here to take care of them. I need a kidney donor.

"My blood type is O positive and any person with a Blood Type O can be a possible match. My wife, her siblings and cousins are not the same blood type or acceptable donors, as they are either older or younger with various health concerns."

He notes that a person can live a full and healthy life with one kidney. "A live donor would be a great gift, a mitzvah, a gift of life."

His mother, Helen Zenith, has taken the lead in finding a donor. She started a Facebook page because, she says, people are turning to social media.

Paul Jacobs' kidneys failed in 2010, as a result of polycystic kidney disease, which can be inherited. Direct family members are therefore not suitable donors. He went on dialysis three times a week.

Jacobs' wife, Nellie, volunteered to donate a kidney, and after going through months of testing, they determined that she was compatible and an excellent match.

"We thought we were home-free for the next 20 years," she says. "Unfortunately, two years ago, his transplanted kidney's function was compromised by a rare effect of a virus."

She notes that contrary to widespread belief, "there is no living kidney list in North America."

Helen Zenith told The CJN that initially it was confusing to figure out the system in Toronto. "You can only apply for a kidney from a deceased donor after you are on dialysis. Zac, who is not on dialysis although his kidney function has dropped significantly, has already done a work-up and he's been found to be transplant worthy, if a private donor can be found."

In Ontario, she said, when someone goes on dialysis, he or she is "automatically" added to the bottom of the list of recipients, who typically have to wait seven to 10 years.

Jacobs, the father of four children and eight grandchildren, says he prays to be able to continue his work and to enjoy the freedom to come and go.

Nellie Jacobs told The CJN that "it's time to create a living kidney registry. The outcome of living kidney donors is excellent. Our bodies are able to adjust and function quite well with only one kidney. I can attest to that.

"The well-being of the potential donor is never compromised for the sake of the recipient." ■

New JNF Winnipeg head has fundraising track record

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Ariel Karabelnicoff, newly appointed executive director of the Jewish National Fund's Winnipeg office, sees life as a journey, and that journey to his present position has taken him full circle.

Karabelnicoff has been working for the JNF and Israel – in one capacity or another – for almost his entire life. "I started raising money for the JNF in my home town in Argentina when I was six years old, asking people to contribute to the JNF on an individual basis" he says, recalling the ubiquitous blue box in his home.

Karabelnicoff grew up in La Plata, in Buenos Aires province. In 1988, he made aliyah, and in Israel he met his wife, Gabby, who had also made aliyah from Argentina. He studied at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, served in the IDF, and worked in government as an aide to Israeli cabinet minister Shlomo Ben Ami. Karabelnicoff and his family came to Winnipeg in 2003.

Initially, he worked in the financial services industry, but, he says, almost from the beginning he volunteered with JNF where he and Rami Kleinmann, the shaliach here, became close friends. Kleinmann left Winnipeg and the JNF in 2007 for Toronto where he is currently the president and CEO of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

In 2006, Karabelnicoff was hired as the executive director of the State of Israel Bonds office in Winnipeg, and in that capacity, he shared an office with the JNF.

After compiling a strong record in Israel Bond sales, he moved on, two years ago, to serve as the new executive director of the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Over the past two years, he and his board hosted a number of programs that greatly raised the BGU profile locally.

As for moving back to JNF he says, "I feel privileged to have been chosen for such an important position.

"This is an opportunity to represent one of the largest organizations in world Jewry. I can continue working for Israel on a much larger scale. JNF has partnerships with so many important institutions throughout Israel."

JNF is unique, he says. "As the caretaker of the land of Israel, JNF touches every corner of the [country.]"

Karla Berbrayer, JNF president for Manitoba and Saskatchewan, says that Karabelnicoff "impressed the board members a great deal with his knowledge about JNF and Israel. He came across as a candidate with strong leadership skills. We are very excited and happy that Ariel is taking the helm here."

Karabelnicoff says that he is looking forward to building on the excellent level of achievement left him by his predecessor. "For me, this is not a job. It is a calling. I see myself in this role as an enabler, helping people – Jewish and non-Jewish – to connect with the land of Israel and the people of Israel. The bar is high. I hope that I can measure up." ■

YOU AND YOUR FAMILY
MAY BE UNDER PROTECTED

Despite the high premiums you are paying for your car insurance, you are probably underinsured. The minimum liability insurance coverage in Ontario of $200,000 has not changed for over 30 years. If you or your family are injured by an uninsured or underinsured driver you can supplement the claim you may have under the Family Protection Coverage (OPCF 44R). The Family Protection Coverage will have limits equal to the third party limits on your own vehicle. We recommend speaking with an insurance broker or your insurance company and making sure your family is fully protected. Our firm exclusively deals with insurance claims and have been doing so for over 30 years. We often come across uninsured and underinsured negligent drivers and want to make sure you take the steps needed to protect you and your family.

Authors probe motives of philanthropic big givers

plungen@thecjn.ca

In fundraising they say 20 per cent of the people contribute 80 per cent of the money, and when it comes to big projects, that can amount to a lot of loonies.

Multimillion-dollar gifts have helped hospitals erect new wings, build opera houses, open specialized schools in universities, and in the case of the Jewish community, construct a network of agencies that boggles the mind, as well as a sprawling new campus in what was vacant land not that long ago.

So what motivates the super-rich to write cheques in the millions of dollars for projects such as these and to select among the 86,000 non-profit organizations in Canada?

Chuck English and Mo Lidsky set out to find the answer. A few weeks ago, they released the results of their research in the form of a new book titled, The Philanthropic Mind. The book features interviews with close to 50 big givers, each of whom made at least one donation greater than $1 million.

Many of the profiled philanthropists are familiar to the Jewish community. Some have headed UJA fundraising campaigns. Others have given to Jewish causes and those in Israel. Among the notables in The Philanthropic Mind are Joe Lebovic, Seymour Schulich, Izzy Sharp, Lawrence Bloomberg, Linda Frum and Howard Sokolowski, Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman, as well as Ed and Fran Sonshine.

About 60 per cent of the philanthropists cited in the book are Jewish, leading to the inevitable question: what is it that makes Jews particularly generous?

Well, "among Jews, there is a strong tradition, a strong heritage for the idea of tzedakah," said English, a consultant to businesses and not-for-profits. "Almost all the people we talked to said their parents and grandparents shaped their giving inclination."

The principle of tithing is part of the Jewish heritage, even among assimilated Jews, added Lidsky, a principal at Prime Quadrant, an investment research and consulting firm. In addition, over the years Jews have had to create their own communal infrastructure, "and that has lots of pieces. Jews have lots of organizations" with plenty of boards to run and projects to conceive, fund and build.

Referring to the plethora of "Friends" groups in the Jewish community, which support charities in Canada and Israel, Lidsky said you don't find that kind of extensive infrastructure in other Canadian communities. "It's so central to who we are and what we do."

Of course, Jews are not the only people with a sense of community responsibility who are profiled in The Philanthropic Mind. Others include Tony Comper, Donald Johnson and Richard Ivey.

English said for both Jews and non-Jews, "their parents established for them an example of giving. In many cases, it was direct service giving," such as doing volunteer work. "Most came from families that were philanthropic in spirit. Clearly that was something that was ingrained. Many felt fortunate to enjoy their success and felt an obligation to give back," he said.

"Philanthropists are almost wired to give," Lidsky said. "They want to give, so much so, that if people penetrated the barriers they need to put up, they'd have a hard time saying no." If you get the meeting, he added, "you're 90 per cent there."

Over the course of their research, English and Lidsky uncovered several findings that would interest staff at not-for-profits, fundraisers and other potential purchasers of the book. One focuses on the changing demographic of big givers. Second generation philanthropists increasingly are demanding accountability in how the money is spent. They don't simply want to write a cheque. They want to see results.

"The sense we got is that second generation philanthropists tend to be more selective." Many have inherited the wealth and feel they are its stewards. Plus, when they attach their name to a cause, they want to be sure the money is well spent and the charity accomplishes its stated goals, Lidsky said.

There's even an important psychological benefit to giving away one's wealth. English found big givers "want to feel passionate about things and feel part of something."

Their research backed up that finding. The authors cite psychologists Netta Weinstein and Richard Ryan who found that giving energizes the giver when it's done with passion and joy. It provides them with "a sense of fulfilment and empowerment," the researchers found.

There's no similar psychological benefit when giving is done through a sense of duty or obligation. ■

Ottawa school adopts immersive Hebrew program

OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

The Ottawa Jewish Community School (OJCS) has become the first school in Canada to implement the Ulpan-Or method, an innovative, technology-based, interactive and immersive way of rapidly teaching conversational Hebrew to students.

Developed in Israel 20 years ago, Ulpan-Or teaches Hebrew as a second language through what's called "rapid language acquisition." Taught in both physical classrooms and online, the method is designed to help students learn and speak Hebrew quickly, as well as build their confidence and love of the language.

The program is geared to grades 6 to 8, but the school has started using it in Grade 5, because educators felt students were ready for it.

"Using laptops and iPads, our students have access to online materials that include video and audio files, electronic flash cards, e-books and an interactive newspaper, which is published in Israel," said head of school Marlene Wolinsky. "This also gives us a connection to the news and events in Israel, helping our children form a connection to Israel."

Noga Reiss has been teaching Hebrew at OJCS for a quarter century, but eagerly adopted the new method. The school previously used a traditional textbook-based, vocabulary-centred way of teaching.

"The students just love the program," Reiss said. "It is all online, all accessible from both home and school."

Reiss said she's already seeing benefits.

"Students have various skill levels when it comes to learning a new language – some are visual learners while others are auditory learners. Ulpan-Or provides students with beginner lessons to the most advanced lessons," she said. "The progress is instant. My students were able to speak Hebrew on their first day of school."

A local philanthropist is helping to fund the initiative. "The opportunity arose through Barbara Crook. Based on her own experience with the program, which has been a fantastic learning experience for her, she wondered if OJCS would be interested in acquiring the program," Wolinsky said.

Crook has been studying Hebrew for a decade through Ulpan-Or, both on trips to Israel and by telephone and Skype. She was impressed by how quickly it lets people actually begin to speak Hebrew. "After the first lesson, starting with nothing, I was able to walk out and speak with people a few words in Hebrew," she said. "It wasn't a lot, just 'Hello, my name is,' but it was very empowering," she said.

OJCS enthusiastically accepted her offer to fund teacher training for the program. In August, Ulpan-Or vice-president Nachum Ganor, son of founders Orly and Yoel Ganor, travelled to Ottawa to train two of the school's Hebrew-language teachers.

"One of the things that Nachum helped us understand was the importance of surrounding our students with the Hebrew language and really immersing them with opportunities to use the language in conversational ways," Wolinsky said.

Part of the goal is to make learning Hebrew enjoyable. "We want it to be fun for students, and that's why we use technology, because this is their language, this is their mother tongue nowadays," Ganor said. "We want them to come to Israel and feel comfortable speaking Hebrew in the Israeli streets," he said. "Of course, it will also be an opening for them Judaically."

The students can relate easily to the material. "The students are learning words for everyday foods that we find in our grocery store... and they are encouraged to go out into the community and videotape themselves using the language in the grocery store. For example, two students will go to the store with an iPad and video themselves conversing about what they would be eating on Shabbat. Then they would replay the video in the classroom," Wolinsky said.

"We hope to be the school in Canada to provide information to other schools and perhaps to train other teachers and schools as we become more experienced with the program," Wolinsky said. "We see a tremendous leadership opportunity." ■

YU simchah squad enhances chagim at Halifax shul

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

The enthusiasm was electric, just as promised.

When Hisoriri was booked to come to Halifax's Beth Israel Synagogue, the volunteer group of young people from New York – all with Yeshiva University and Orthodox backgrounds – guaranteed a lively Simchat Torah service.

Singing, dancing and general celebration filled the shul as the four young adults brought their brand of excitement and passion to the services.

"Many people told me it was the best Simchat Torah they had ever experienced," said Rabbi Amram Maccabi of the soon-to-be 125-year-old congregation.

"It was certainly what I expected when I booked them and more. They made a connection with our congregants, many of whom asked for their contact information so they could stay in touch."

Dov Winston, a 24-year-old rabbinical studies student at YU, formed the group about six months ago. He has 25 consistently available volunteers, from a roster of 70, most of whom live in the Washington Heights area of New York City.

Ranging in age from 18 to 26, the young men and women are university graduates and friends looking for things to do to help Orthodox shuls enhance their programs.

"We are passionate about Judaism. We care about Judaism," said Winston, who was raised in Long Island's Cedarhurst area. "We try to make the events and services we attend unforgettable with our dancing and singing, and our enthusiasm."

Each of the four who visited Halifax either led services, did Torah layning or presented a dvar Torah during Shmini Atzeret or Simchat Torah.

Julia Siegel, a 24-year-old from Kansas City, Mo., is a graduate student in experiential Jewish education. "Dov posted the opportunity to come to Halifax, and I enjoy going to new communities, bringing extra energy to them. Everyone here was warm and friendly."

Zvi Zuckier, 24, from Teaneck N.J., is studying social work. Michael Yudien, 25, of Boca Raton, Fla., works for United Hatzalah in New York, supporting life-saving efforts in Israel.

Synagogue members assist with travel expenses and accommodation, and host the visitors for meals, enabling Hisoriri to provide volunteer service.

Winston, came up with the group's name, Hisoriri, Hebrew for "to awaken," while studying at a yeshiva in Jerusalem five years ago. "I discovered it wasn't that hard to change, without doing that much work, but by just devoting yourself to it. The key is always asking God for help. I started doing this outreach work, then and formed Hisoriri last April," he said.

"It's not just a one-off for communities, but a chance to form relationships that will bring us back again and again. For example, we go to a shul in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., (near Scranton) for three or four Shabbatons a year."

He added, "I love people, Jewish people in particular. If I can connect Jews, how can I not do that? We're prepared to go to any Orthodox community. Just visit our website at hisoriri.com." ■

SeeJN | Simchat Torah up close and personal

At Leo Baeck Day School's north campus, Rabbi Noam Katz – the school's dean of Jewish living – makes a point by highlighting a parshah on a fully unrolled Torah scroll. Students held the scroll on their laps for an up close learning experience as part of the celebration of Simchat Torah.

Community gathers to mourn slain Israeli

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Hundreds mourned with the Benitah family outside their Côte St. Luc home.

At the conclusion of Sukkot, several hundred people gathered on the street outside the Côte St. Luc home of the family of an Israeli murdered three days earlier by a Palestinian in Jerusalem.

Natan Benitah, a brother of the slain Aharon Benitah, 21, lives in Montreal. Their parents were visiting here after the birth of a child to Natan and his wife, Joy Elhaddad, a native of Montreal.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron where Benitah davens, said the evening prayer was recited outside the home and then songs of mourning were sung.

It was in stark contrast to the usual celebration following Simchat Torah.

Israeli Consul General Ziv Nevo Kulman then drove the two couples to the airport where they left for Israel.

"Aharon's father spoke to the gathering, expressing his gratitude to the community for its support over these difficult days, as well as his faith in God and the destiny of the Jewish People," said Rabbi Poupko, who had spent several hours in private with the family as well. "They are overwhelmed with grief," he said.

Privately, he said the family was "distressed by some of the media coverage of the murder, almost legitimizing it by referring to Aharon as a settler and reporting that the Palestinian was shot [by police] after the Israeli 'died.'"

Benitah, a resident of a West Bank settlement, was stabbed to death in the Old City near the Lion's Gate on the evening of Oct. 3, just after the end of Shabbat.

Rabbi Poupko said Nevo Kulman immediately joined the family at the conclusion of Shabbat here several hours later. ■

Winnipeg's day school enrolment looking up this year

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

The outlook for Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education is looking brighter this year after a significant drop in student numbers over the past few years.

Much of the decline, then-head of school and CEO Rory Paul said in an interview last year, was due to a number of families leaving the city to pursue career opportunities elsewhere.

This year, new head of school and CEO Lori Binder, who succeeded Paul last June at Winnipeg's main kindergarten-to-Grade 12 Jewish day school, said student numbers are about the same as last year – slightly over 500. More significantly, she added, the school's retention rate is 99 per cent.

"That is our highest retention rate in several years," she said. "The fact that our numbers are virtually identical to last year's speaks well to the community's enthusiasm for Jewish education and what we do here at Gray Academy. Many new families are choosing our school and we have many students who are children of alumni."

Binder said the 2015-16 Grade 12 class numbers 29 students, compared to just 20 graduates last spring. There are also 48 students in the Grade 11 class.

At the other end of the spectrum, 35 students are enrolled in two kindergarten classes, with 22 in junior kindergarten.

Last year, Paul noted that the smaller numbers – 60 at the time – enrolled in the junior kindergarten and kindergarten classes are due to the recession in 2008 and 2009. "It seems that fewer babies were born in those years," he said in 2014. "Kindergarten numbers are down throughout the city. More recently, there seems to have been a resurgence of births in the community."

There are other positives for the school: its international program, now in its sixth year, is continuing to grow.

"We have six students this year in our high school from Mexico, Brazil and, for the first time, the United States, and we are expecting another couple of students in the second semester," Binder said. "We also have a student from Vancouver."

The out-of-town students come to Winnipeg for a year to study and live with host families.

Lori Binder

She added that two representatives of the U.S.-based EdJEWcon organization are coming to visit the school with an eye to designating Gray Academy as one of its lead schools in Canada. EdJEWcon's stated mission is to "help Jewish day schools reach their potential as exemplars of 21st-century learning in action."

"We have a great new leadership team and board," Binder said. "We are proud to be a leading Jewish day school in North America. Our goal is to work toward ensuring that Gray Academy remains a top-rated Jewish day school for years to come and ensure the continuity of our community for many generations."

Meanwhile, the Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Public School is continuing its upward trajectory. There are more than 200 students this year, compared to 173 last year. The previous high for enrolment was 180 five years ago. Enrolment had dropped as low as 122 in the 2012-2013 school year.

"We have 30 children in kindergarten this year," said Brock Corydon principal Ara Morris. "And we are still registering new students."

The program, the only public school Hebrew bilingual program in North America, provides half-day Hebrew instruction and half-day regular classes. The school also has an enrolment of 100 non-Jewish students. The two groups come together for joint celebrations of Jewish and Christian holidays and other school activities. ■

Jews' presence in Jamaica traced to Spanish Inquisition

plungen@thecjn.ca

Wilfred Lindo

The cruise ships don't stop on the south side of Jamaica much anymore. They're more likely to make port on the north shore, where the beaches are quite spectacular.

But that routing change has deprived many of the cruise passengers from visiting the Shaare Shalom Synagogue in Kingston, the second oldest Jewish house of worship in the Caribbean and arguably, the most beautiful.

At least that's the view of Wilfred Lindo, a native of Jamaica who has lived in Toronto since 1966. The Duke Street synagogue features the white sand floors that are distinctive among the old Caribbean synagogues, as well as a very attractive painted white exterior. There was a time when the shul was filled with visitors disembarking from cruise ships, who came to see the historic house of worship, pray there and even be honoured with aliyahs, Lindo said.

They would also come away with a better sense of the Jewish community's history, which can be traced back all the way to the Spanish Inquisition. Lindo, who traces his family's roots in Jamaica to the 1500s, will present his personal perspective on being Jamaican and Jewish at a public lecture at Darchei Noam Synagogue on Sunday, Oct. 18. His presentation is part 1 of a three-part series looking at "The Caribbean Jewish experience." Part 2 is scheduled for Nov. 22 and will examine Guatemala's newest Jewish community, while part 3 will take place on Jan. 17, 2016 and will discuss the renewal of Jewish life in Suriname.

As for Lindo's family, it was the Spanish Inquisition that prompted them to leave their homes in the Iberian Peninsula and seek better lives elsewhere. Lindo's father's family originally hailed from Spain, while his mother's side – the Da Costa family – came from Portugal.

Forced to flee the Inquisition, they lived as conversos (Christian converts) in public, but practised Judaism in private.

They lived that way for generations, until the day in 1655 when the English conquered the island from Spain, and ceased persecuting Jews.

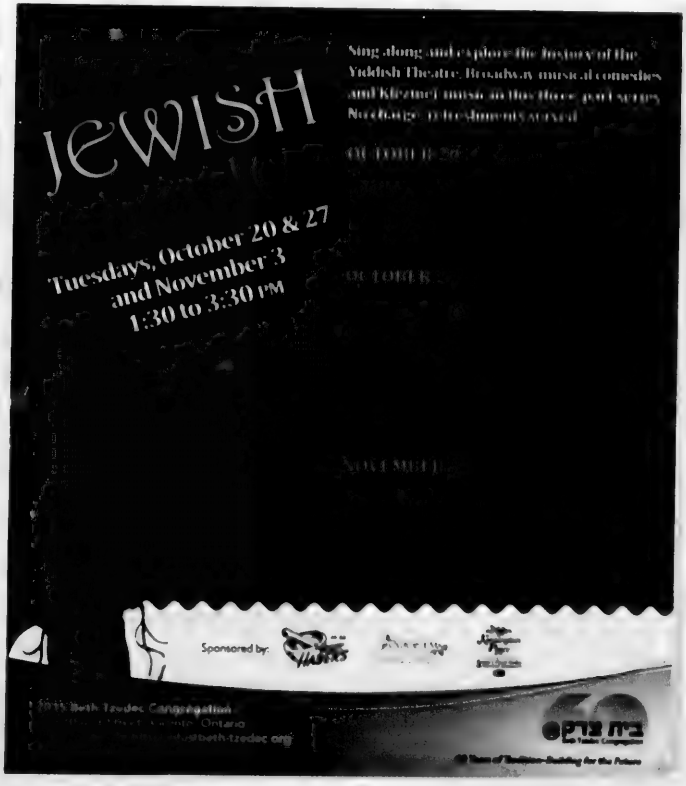
From that time, the Jewish community grew, prospered and became an important part of island life. It could boast a member of Parliament and prominent individuals in all sorts of fields, from business, to accounting, law and more, said Lindo.

But over time, Jamaican Jews departed for more opportunities elsewhere. From a peak of around 3,000 in its heyday, the community has dwindled to only about 250 today. Jamaican Jews can now be found around the world, from Australia, to Mexico, to the United States to Canada.

Lindo made the move to Toronto in 1966 and over time, sponsored his seven other brothers to emigrate here as well. He still has family on the island and visits there every few years. Last year, he helped raise funds to upgrade the synagogue, the last remaining place of worship on an island that at its peak could boast eight such buildings.

Lindo, who serves as president of the Pride of Israel Synagogue benefit society, said that while the number of Jews on the island has decreased, in part because of intermarriage, he's noticed an interesting phenomenon developing in recent years.

"A lot of native people have discovered their roots and are coming back to Judaism," he said. ■



Israel not the only issue in the campaign

He has maintained repeatedly that his party and leader Justin Trudeau are as supportive of Israel as the Conservatives, and that he, personally, takes a back seat to no one on the Jewish state. But Housefather also recognizes that this issue is not uppermost in the minds of most Mount Royal residents and that even many Jews do not want to be treated as a one-issue constituency.

On Sept. 24, Stephen Bronfman, a powerful name in the Jewish community, affirmed at a Housefather event: "I brought Justin [Trudeau] with me to Israel seven years ago. Israel has his support and understanding."

Housefather responded: "For anyone who questions the Liberal party's commitment to and support for the State of Israel, the Bronfman name stands tall. The Bronfman family has played a leadership role in the Canadian Jewish community for generations."

Libman asks: "How many times does the Jewish community want to be fooled by the Liberal party double-speak when it comes to Israel?... Justin Trudeau would have us believe the Liberal party [is] the same [as Harper], when all the evidence says otherwise."

Housefather has also received high-profile endorsements from local politicians, including longtime Snowdon city councillor Marvin Rotrand, borough mayor Russell Copeman, Town of Mount Royal Mayor Philippe Roy and Montreal West Mayor Beny Masella, among others.

Trudeau, whose father, Pierre Elliott, represented Mount Royal from 1965-84, had not at time of writing visited the riding.

There have been reports of over-zealous Libman volunteers trying to shame Jews into voting Conservative, which Libman has apologized for.

Declared Liberal supporter Mitchell Kujavsky says he resents the Conservatives dealing in the "politics of fear" on Israel. "The sheer amount of misinformation and false rumours circulating through emails and word-of-mouth has been alarming... From stolen and defaced signs to door-to-door volunteers accusing their fellow Jews of being anti-Semites, it has been nothing short of concerning and, at times, disturbing."

Libman campaign worker Thelma Shapiro said, "Both sides have pointed fingers at each other about misbehaviour, with no conclusive proof on either side."

During the campaign's final days, Shapiro said, the Mount Royal Tories are avoiding going "negative" and attacking opponents.

"The parties' position on Israel has been in the spotlight, but we are stepping back and looking at the total picture, the many issues of concern in the riding."

Libman and Housefather have similar backgrounds. Both are graduates of Herzliah High School, got their start in public life at an early age, were leaders in the anglophone rights movement (Housefather was president of Alliance Quebec), were municipal officials, and are at ease before crowds.

They have different personas, though. While both are thoughtful and articulate, Libman projects a sober, formal image next to Housefather's sunny congeniality.

Just how divided Jewish voters in Mount Royal remain, even within families, is epitomized by Dida Berku and Jack Kincler, a couple married for 36 years. He is a staunch Conservative; she is for the Liberals.

"I love Anthony, he's a wonderful person... Whoever is elected is not going to make a huge difference at the local level, our lives are not going to change much," said Kincler, a businessman and chair of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research [which takes no side in the election.]

"The major issue for me is Israel, and Harper is definitely been the best friend for Israel. We owe him a debt of gratitude."

Berku, a Côte St. Luc city councillor and lawyer, said, "I think Canada has a good record on Israel, whether it has been a Liberal or Conservative government."

Former Progressive Conservative cabinet minister Gerry Weiner, left, gave a boost to Robert Libman.

While all three major candidates have merit, she said Housefather is "an excellent leader, he builds consensus, he's very responsive to the needs of his constituents."

In other ridings, Jews may not have the demographic weight to make a difference in the outcome.

Two female Sephardi candidates, however, appear to be having an impact. Liberal Rachel Bendayan in Outremont was within less than 10 points of NDP Leader Tom Mulcair (35.1 vs 44.2 per cent) and Conservative Valérie Assouline in Pierrefonds-Dollard was slightly ahead of the NDP incumbent Lysane Blanchette-Lamothe, but well behind Liberal Frank Baylis at close to 45 per cent, according to ThreeHundredEight.com on Oct. 7. A third Sephardi woman, Conservative Pascale Déry, is running in semi-rural Drummond, northeast of Montreal. ■

Mulcair: Both my wife's parents survived the Holocaust

Mulcair: The values of social democratic NDP are the values of the Jewish community – it's a community that always comes together, that will fight hard to make sure that seniors don't live in poverty.

So, with regards to our seniors, the NDP has a clear plan to lift seniors out of poverty. We have several hundred thousand seniors living in real poverty in Canada. We have a plan to put $400 million a year more into what's called the Guaranteed Income Supplement, to help them.

We've also got a very large commitment to get affordable, decent housing. It's almost always women who wind up in those situations of poverty, and we've got to understand that as well.

> The party I have the honour of leading connects a great deal with the Jewish community on the level of values.

The CJN: Finally, what is your message to Jewish voters across this country?

Mulcair: My message is that I'm the only leader in this campaign who has a strong family connection to the Jewish community. Both of my wife's parents survived the Holocaust. She has family in Israel.

For me, this is not just a theoretical issue. It's a very personal one.

I also know that the party I have the honour of leading connects a great deal with the Jewish community on the level of values. Taking care of others – those are fundamental values that I've always encountered in the Jewish community. And giving to others – generosity. That's the same type of approach that the NDP has always taken.

I was just given an example this week where the Jewish community has been working very hard to help bring in Syrian refugees from Jordan. I think that's one of the most beautiful and telling Canadian stories I've heard in a long time. That's the Canada that I know exists.

I want a Canada where we respect our democratic institutions at home, and where our international reputation is respected abroad. ■

Bibi's message: Trust me and we'll beat this terror war too

DAVID HOROVITZ
JERUSALEM

Amid a new terror phase, marked by a surge over recent days in what might be described as Palestinian "suicide stabbings" – relentless attacks by lone terrorists, across Israel and in the West Bank – Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu convened a press conference on Oct. 8 to try to reassure an increasingly worried public.

He didn't announce a raft of new measures, but he and his security chiefs set out several central themes that served to underline that Israel is again on something akin to a war footing:

1. This is part of an endless battle against those who want to kill us: Israel has been fighting terrorism since "the start of the Zionist enterprise," Netanyahu said early in his press conference. Fighting it, and beating it. Today we're tackling "terrorists who have been incited and are filled with hatred." And Israel, he promised, will prevail in this phase of the ongoing struggle too. (Half of the hundreds of Palestinians arrested as terror suspects in recent weeks are minors, Internal Security Minister Gilad Erdan said a little later – hundreds of young minds incited to violence.)

2. I'm the best man for the job: simply by bringing together a kind of war council – addressing the public along with two key ministers and two security chiefs – Netanyahu was underlining that this is, if not a war, another serious and likely protracted battle. He hadn't convened this kind of public forum since last summer's war against Hamas in Gaza. And the message he hammered home was that his "team" could be trusted to beat the terrorists. And that his political opponents – making their irresponsible declarations from right and left – could not.

3. Israelis are a brave, resilient people: Netanyahu took pains to praise the "acts of heroism" by soldiers, cops and "ordinary citizens" who have intervened to thwart and halt several attacks in recent days. It's a lousy neighbourhood, he acknowledged. "We live in the Middle East," he noted dryly, "and the flames of extremism reach us too." But he was "proud" to be part of a nation of such courage and determination.

Benjamin Netanyahu speaks as he holds a joint press conference, Oct. 8, at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem regarding the recent wave of terror in Israel.

> We live in the Middle East ... and the flames of extremism reach us too.

4. Palestinian National Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is part of the problem, but could also be part of the solution: Hamas, Abbas, the Palestinian Authority and Israel's own Islamic Movement have all been cynically "inciting" terrorism by disseminating the lie that Israel intends to change the status quo on the Temple Mount, the prime minister charged. He took pains to stress that this is not the case – in other words, that he has no intention of permitting Jewish prayer at the site, or widening Jewish access. In order to try to calm the situation at the mount, he pointed out, he has now even banned Knesset members – Jew and Muslim – from visiting. He was also careful not to place Abbas completely in the enemy camp. He hoped, he said, that he saw the beginning of a change in Abbas' statements and actions in recent days, although he wasn't sure. And he was as ready as ever, he insisted, to resume negotiations – without preconditions but also, obviously, without relinquishing key Israeli interests. He indicated, tellingly, that were the situation to spiral further out of control in the territories, the PA could find itself swept away by the wave of violent extremism.

5. This is not the same terror war as 15 years ago: Netanyahu and especially Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon were determined to project that this is currently a less devastating incarnation of the terror war than the second intifada. Ya'alon claimed that "Israel has been on the offensive" in the West Bank ever since Operation Defensive Shield in 2002, when the infrastructure behind the onslaught of suicide bombers was smashed, and that today's use of knives, stones and petrol bombs was a consequence of terrorists being unable to orchestrate attempts at wider killings. If necessary, the IDF would use "crushing" force, the defence minister said. But as things stood, what was needed was ongoing good intelligence, smaller-scale actions by the security forces, and a great deal of public awareness.

6. Israelis had better not take the law into their own hands: the acting police chief Bentzi Sau issued the starkest warning to Israelis not to start attacking Palestinians or Israeli Arabs in revenge. Several times in the past two days, Israeli civilians not only helped thwart stabbings, but also then protected the disarmed assailants from the wrath of other civilians until the police arrived.

7. Security takes precedence over settlements: It was "common sense," said Netanyahu, for him not to risk alienating parts of the international community by ordering new settlement building, as many of his right-wing coalition colleagues have demanded. He was determined, he said, to maintain wide outside backing for measures that have included sending troops into PA-controlled cities and "sharpening" open fire orders. Nobody needed to teach him lessons about the value of settlements, he declared, but his prime obligation was to the security of Israel's citizens. "Common sense" dictated the pragmatic course, he repeated. Common sense or not, this marked a departure from some past confrontations, when Netanyahu has responded to terror attacks by approving new settlement homes.

8. A wider coalition, with pleasure: asked about a larger government, perhaps including the centre-left Zionist Union, Netanyahu was all open arms. The terrorists don't distinguish between left- and right-wing Israelis, and lots of the arguments that divide mainstream politicians are pointless, he asserted. He's the man in charge, Netanyahu made abundantly clear, but "I want a wide coalition, and a unified people." ■

Good friends and causes

Sagi Melamed

I recently received the following from my son Guy, and share it as is with you, my CJN readers:

A spacious house on the shores of a clear, blue lake. Azure sky above. Mountains and forest all around. What more could one dream about?

A few months ago, after 18 demanding months of physical and mental exertion which included tests and challenges, sleepless nights, growth and maturation, "Ron" (a pseudonym) and I finally completed our training course for an IDF unit.

Ron is a "lone soldier" in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), which means he came to Israel from the Diaspora to join the IDF. After the course's graduation ceremony, Ron received permission from our commanders to visit his family in Canada, to rest a little and enjoy time with family and friends.

One hot, humid morning after Ron returned to Israel, I sat next to him during morning prayers. Ahead of us was a long, arduous day of training. Ron finished folding his tfillin and put them away, then stretched and gave a heavy sigh.

"Oh man, Achi (Bro)!" he said in his non-Israeli accent. "You have no idea how much fun I had! I almost forgot how much fun it is to jet-ski at our summer cottage. Just forgetting everything, water and wind in my face. Seeing all my childhood friends. Now they're all in college, having a crazy time. Parties with no responsibilities. Good times."

The key word for meaningful army service and volunteer work is "giving." The primary measure of people's actions is how much they are willing to give of themselves and their resources. But not all people are equal, in their ability to give, and/or in the effort they need to make. So a wealthy man who donates 10,000 shekels does not give more of himself than a youngster who donates 500 shekels from his bar mitzvah gifts.

> It is not easy for Israeli soldiers to fully appreciate and understand the challenges of the lone soldier

Last week Ron left the base for a happy event. His younger sister came to Israel and joined the army. She was following in the footsteps of Ron and Ron's younger brother, who is also a lone soldier. Their father flew to Israel from Canada especially for the occasion, and the three siblings and their proud father all celebrated together.

It is not clear or easy for Israeli soldiers to fully appreciate and understand the challenges of the lone soldier. In addition to adapting to a foreign language, a different culture and a different weather, when he goes "home" on weekend leave, Ron's mother does not welcome him at the door with a loving hug and help him remove the heavy bag of dirty laundry from his shoulders. He does his own laundry (despite our offers to take his laundry home with us). He eats his Shabbat meals with host families, or sometimes, with friends. And prepares himself alone for the next week.

A rabbi at Yeshivat Ma'ale Gilboa where I studied says: "There is nothing more Jewish than an audible sigh." He claimed it is a quintessential Jewish act of great significance.

I finished putting away my own tfillin and heard Ron's sigh. I put an encouraging hand on his shoulder and said: "Ron, you already know that the reason you came to Israel, the Jewish homeland, was not for the college parties and beer or for wide lakes and evergreen forests. You came for the good friends who stand with you through hard times, and for causes worth the sacrifice. And those things Israel knows how to give." — GUY MELAMED

Israeli PM vows to return security to Israel

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week that the government would take steps to combat incitement against Israelis by the Palestinian Authority, Islamic Movement and even other countries in the region as the country is in the grips of "a wave of terrorism."

At a press conference on Oct. 8, convened after four stabbing attacks in Israel, Netanyahu lauded the soldiers, police officers and citizens of Israel for their bravery, and said the government would "return security" to the country.

"In recent days and hours I have seen displays of heroism by soldiers, police and – no less – by civilians. I see this in Jerusalem, Kiryat Gat, Hebron, Petah Tikva, Tel Aviv and now in Afula," he said. "Israelis are acting with bravery, composure and determination to neutralize and eliminate the terrorists. This requires extraordinary courage and resourcefulness and we are proud to be part of a country that has such citizens."

In a show of unity and force, Netanyahu was accompanied by Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon, Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan, IDF Chief of Staff Gadi Eisenkot, and acting Israel Police chief Bentzi Sau.

"We are in the midst of a wave of terrorism with knives, firebombs, rocks and even live fire. While these acts are mostly unorganized, they are all the result of wild and mendacious incitement by Hamas, the Palestinian Authority, several countries in the region and – no less and frequently much more – the Islamic Movement in Israel, which is igniting the ground with lies regarding our policy on the Temple Mount and the purported changes that we want to make to the status quo," the prime minister continued. "This is an absolute lie. We are also taking action against the inciters and the attackers."

The head of the northern branch of the Islamic Movement, Sheikh Raed Salah, said earlier in the day that his organization intends to respond to what he called "continued Israeli escalation" against the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

"We have a package of plans ready to be unleashed immediately," Salah said.

Netanyahu said the government would adopt "aggressive steps" to combat the Islamic Movement's incitement.

Taking the podium next, Ya'alon also insisted that Israel had no intention of changing the status quo on the Temple Mount.

Erdan, meanwhile, said Israel would be "increasing the minimum sentences even for stone and Molotov cocktail throwing, so that they [the perpetrators] know they will sit for a long time in prison."

Hinting at a desire to bring Zionist Union into his government, Netanyahu said it was easy for opposition leader Isaac Herzog to criticize as he was not in the ruling coalition.

"Maybe, if I weren't in power, I would hear hints," he said.

But the prime minister suggested he'd be open to a coalition government with the 24-seat Zionist Union, which would significantly expand his narrow 61-seat government. "At this time we need to join forces, we need a broad national front," he said.

Herzog said in response that Netanyahu "runs from speech to speech but words don't stop terrorism and don't serve security." ■

U.S. finds itself in Israel's shoes after hospital bombing

BEN SALES
JTA, JERUSALEM

One of the low points of last year's Gaza war was Israel's Aug. 3 strike outside a United Nations school in the city of Rafah. The strike, meant to hit a military target according to the Israel Defence Forces, killed at least 10 people and injured dozens. It was the latest in a string of Israeli bombs to hit UN facilities.

As news of the bombing spread, the UN issued a swift condemnation, calling it a "moral outrage and criminal act." So did the United States, condemning the shelling and admonishing Israel to adhere to higher standards of warfare.

"The United States is appalled by today's disgraceful shelling outside an UNRWA school in Rafah sheltering some 3,000 displaced persons, in which 10 more Palestinian civilians were tragically killed," State Department spokesperson Jen Psaki said in a statement on the same day as the Rafah strike. "We once again stress that Israel must do more to meet its own standards and avoid civilian casualties."

Now, the United States finds itself in Israel's place, fending off criticism after its forces bombed a Doctors Without Borders hospital in Afghanistan Saturday, killing 22. The UN issued a harsh condemnation that recalled its criticism of Israel.

> It's safe to say that this attack, this bombing, was not intentional
> Mark Toner, State Department spokesperson

"This event is utterly tragic, inexcusable, and possibly even criminal," UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Zeid Ra'ad Al Hussein said in a statement Saturday. "International and Afghan military planners have an obligation to respect and protect civilians at all times, and medical facilities and personnel are the object of a special protection."

The U.S. State Department, on the other hand, has not rushed to criticize its own country the way it did Israel. When the Associated Press' Matt Lee pressed State Department spokesperson Mark Toner on the similarities between the Rafah strike and Saturday's, Toner did what Israel has done, stressing that any civilian casualties are unfortunate and unintentional, and that an investigation of the incident is underway.

"I think it's safe to say that this attack, this bombing, was not intentional," Toner said in response to Lee at a Monday press conference. "I can't get into what may or may not have happened on the ground, whether the co-ordinates were known, whether they were acknowledged. It's just too much speculation at this point. So you'll hopefully give me a pass if we wait for the investigation to run its course."

Further pushed by Lee, Toner would not call the hospital strike "appalling" or "disgraceful."

It's no shock that the U.S. would go easier on itself than on another country. But the apparent inconsistency in State Department statements speaks to what some call an unparalleled level of scrutiny of Israel. Israel, some critics say, receives far more of the world's attention and ire than do other conflict zones where the fighting is as bad or worse.

In an article published near the midpoint of last year's Gaza war, Atlantic correspondent Jeffrey Goldberg noted that the New York Times had devoted far more recent coverage to Israel and Gaza than to Syria – even though Syria's death toll was far larger. Goldberg attributed the disparity to the access journalists had to the Gaza conflict, as well as to what he called disproportionate interest in Israel and Jews.

"As far as I can tell, the Times, as of this writing, has not addressed this most recent round of Syria carnage in an even semi-comprehensive way," he wrote. "It goes without saying that continuing violence in Libya, Egypt, Nigeria, Yemen, and so on, has not received much attention from the Times in recent days."

A couple of weeks later, the Economist quantified that interest. In two graphs charting Google searches and death tolls for various conflicts, the magazine showed that Israel was Googled about 10 times more than Syria in early July, although the Gaza death toll was a fraction of Syria's.

But if the U.S. military is taking its cues from the IDF, Israel's Foreign Ministry isn't playing the State Department's role. Asked whether it had any reaction to Saturday's U.S. strike on the hospital, a spokesperson told JTA the ministry had no comment. ■

'Wave of terror' continues in West Bank and Israel

Access to Temple Mount restricted to women and older men

JTA
JERUSALEM

Two Israelis were lightly injured and one Palestinian killed in stabbing attacks in Jerusalem and the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba on Oct. 10.

The attack in Kiryat Arba near Hebron occurred at around noon last Friday, when a Palestinian man stabbed a police officer stationed there, inflicting minor injuries. Another officer shot and killed the assailant, according to a report of the incident by the Israel Police.

According to Army Radio, the assailant tried to grab the weapon of the officer he stabbed.

Shortly thereafter, a Palestinian assailant described as a teenager by witnesses, stabbed an Israeli 16-year-old in the capital, police said. A suspect, matching the description of the attacker, was later apprehended by police. The victim suffered minor injuries.

Also last Friday, a Palestinian woman was shot at a bus station in Afula after trying to stab a uniformed man, according to Ynet. According to Army Radio, the victim was a soldier who was not wounded. The woman sustained moderate to serious injuries from gunshots the soldier fired at her.

The attacks happened after a Jewish Israeli man stabbed four Arabs in Dimona near Be'er Sheva that morning, reportedly as revenge for Palestinian terror attacks in previous days. Two of his victims sustained minor injuries and the remaining two were moderately injured. He was apprehended after fleeing the scene.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu strongly condemned "the attack against innocent Arabs," his office wrote in a statement. "Israel is a country of law and order. Those who use violence and break the law – from whatever side – will be dealt with to the fullest extent of the law."

Because of the spate of violence, Netanyahu shelved a plan for government offices near the Western Wall, saying that building in the sensitive area could spur more violence.

Beit Haliba was scheduled for approval by the Interior Ministry's District Committee for Construction and Planning in Jerusalem, but the approval process was suspended indefinitely following a request for its removal from the agenda by the Prime Minister's Bureau, Army Radio reported.

The request cited the desire to refrain from moves that could lead to an escalation in violence, the report said.

The Western Wall is adjacent to the Temple Mount, which Muslims refer to as Haram al Sharif, a site holy to both Islam and Judaism that has been the focus of the recent escalation in violence.

According to the plan, the Beit Haliba is to include office space for the Western Wall Heritage Foundation and several government offices, which the report on Army Radio did not specify.

The suspension comes amid what Netanyahu described as a "wave of terror" by Palestinians in the West Bank and Israel, and especially in Jerusalem. Two weeks ago, two Israelis in their 30s, Na'ama and Eitam Henkin, were killed in an attack near the West Bank settlement of Itamar. Several Palestinians were also killed and injured in clashes with security forces.

On Oct. 9 Israeli authorities restricted access to the Temple Mount area to Palestinian men older than 50. Women's access is unrestricted.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas accused Israel of trying to cause Palestinians to act violently.

"We will not allow ourselves to be dragged where they want to drag us," Abbas said at a ribbon-cutting ceremony for a new building in Ramallah, according to a translation of his speech provided by Army Radio. ■

Hana's Suitcase is a timeless and timely story

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Young People's Theatre (YPT) is opening its 50th season with Hana's Suitcase, a show it's produced three times before. But it's a play that has endured despite premiering more than 10 years ago.

"Hana's Suitcase can be both a timeless and timely story," says playwright Emil Sher, who adapted Karen Levine's best-selling and award-winning novel for YPT back in 2005.

Since then, the theatre company remounted it in 2007 and 2010, sharing the Brady family's poignant Holocaust story on stage for children ages 10 and up.

Those who've read Levine's book know that despite its inherent darkness, Hana's Suitcase is rather inspiring as it chronicles how in 2000, a group of Japanese school kids and their teacher searched for clues about Hana Brady (played by Caroline Toal) after her suitcase arrived at Tokyo's tiny Children's Holocaust Centre.

"It's such a beautiful and moving and vital kind of story," says YPT's artistic director Allen MacInnis, who's also directing the play. "And I felt that our 50th anniversary should include it. And as we planned the season, it became clear that we should open the season with it so that we could make it available to tour to other places." After its run in Toronto, it'll travel to Montreal and later, Seattle.

MacInnis knows that teaching about the Holocaust can be challenging. But this play is made for younger audiences and it follows the Japanese children as they slowly uncover details about Hana's short life.

"We assume that the audience, which is about the same age, is able to handle what they learn," says MacInnis. "We certainly don't get into some of the most horrifying details about the Holocaust, but we do get into many of the facts."

They learn that the Nazis forced Hana Brady and her family out of their home in Czechoslovakia to the Theresienstadt ghetto. Eventually, Hana ended up in Auschwitz where she died at age 13. Her brother George Brady (played by Noah Spitzer) survived and he currently resides in Toronto.

Thousands of children's drawings also survived Theresienstadt, including some of Hana's. These are incorporated into YPT's show.

"In our production, periodically we're using photographs and copies of those drawings just to connect the story for our young audience to the fact that it is also something of a documentary, that it's not just a story; it is a true story," says MacInnis.

Sher was also mindful of that when first adapting the play. He even sought out George Brady's feedback. "I felt a huge sense of responsibility to honour the story with all the respect it deserves," says Sher.

That included ending it on a hopeful note. "It would have been hopeless if Hana's story would have died with her in Auschwitz," says Sher.

Once again, a new generation of children can come to know Hana and George Brady. And beyond simply learning about them, young audiences will get the opportunity to discuss the story in a question and answer period following each performance.

Both Sher and MacInnis know that the show's themes will resonate with children today, especially amidst the ongoing refugee crisis. Ultimately, they hope audiences can learn from the Japanese children who felt so connected to Hana Brady.

"The fact that they could come to care so much about her creates such a story of hope," says MacInnis, "that maybe the next generation of children will be the kind of people that will ensure our world never does this again." ■

The secret Jewishness of Trevor Noah

Michael Fraiman

It was a slow news day on March 31, when social-justice sleuths resurfaced some of the older, sexist, carelessly mean-spirited Twitter jokes from the account of Trevor Noah, the new Daily Show host who made his debut on Sept. 28. While cracking about fat chicks and beating up women, Noah offended some Jews, too:

"Messi gets the ball and the real players try foul him, but Messi doesn't go down easy, just like Jewish chicks."

"Almost bumped a Jewish kid crossing the road. He didn't look b4 crossing but I still would hav (sic) felt so bad in my German car!"

"Behind every successful Rap Billionaire is a double as rich Jewish man. #BeatsBy-Dreidel"

And so began a torrential flood of think-pieces as the Internet slammed into outrage overdrive. In mere hours, Noah went from being a welcome new black face on late-night TV to a misogynistic, racist, fat-shaming anti-Semite whose jokes one writer deemed as "annihilatingly stupid."

Noah slid away from social media after that, offering a limp half-apology on Twitter and largely hiding behind Comedy Central's statement of defence. He seemed shell-shocked by his tenuous propulsion to American fame. His Twitter account became mostly self-promotion for the show and his summer comedy tour (which included well-received spots at Just for Laughs in Montreal and JFL42 in Toronto), and by early April, he was busy doing public damage control with Jerry Seinfeld and Larry David at a New York Mets game – just casually hanging out with some Jews.

Now, to be clear: despite the vaguely biblical surname, Noah isn't a practising Jew (though he is, technically, one-quarter Jewish; his father is Swiss-German, his mother a Xhosa-Jewish South African), but an aura of Jewishness nonetheless lingers around him. The most obvious point of connection is The Daily Show, which launched not only the career of Jon Stewart, one of the most influential nebbish comedians alive, but also Josh Gad, Lewis Black and Dave Attell, among others.

But on a broader note, Noah appears to have this freedom when it comes to joking about Jews and Israel. We caught a glimpse from his brief Twitter scandal (OK, so the line about Jewish chicks going down is tired, but can we all agree that #BeatsBy-Dreidel is a fantastic pun?) – yet there's more. He has a standup bit about being called "black Hitler" by a German woman, and has talked openly (and hilariously) about his friend named Hitler – who happens to be a "very good-looking, young black man" with an unfortunate name. He obviously has opinions about Israel and Palestine (pundits have predicted his upbringing in apartheid South Africa will influence that touchy subject) and days before his Daily Show debut, he called Stewart his "Jewish Yoda."

There is an ease with which he approaches these themes in his comedy, a freedom that seems not to stem from a place of malice, as the South African Jewish Board of Deputies has graciously noted, but rather – and this is me inferring independently here – from a place of solidarity.

The irony behind the whole controversy is that, while Noah isn't Jewish, he has inarguably known more bigoted persecution – something we Jews are taught from childhood to understand and appreciate – than any of the modern North American Jews or social-justice warriors who've vowed to boycott his show. Growing up in Soweto, his mother – who was once shot in the face after divorcing a man who later threatened her son's life – had to pretend that Trevor wasn't her child, and was thrown in jail repeatedly for her illicit relationship with a white man. Young Trevor has lived in true squalor, and while he jokes about growing up in poverty, he very rarely speaks publicly about his personal life.

Such prejudice and terror have more to do with blackness and poverty than Judaism, of course – but, then again, blacks and Jews have long maintained an understated sort of camaraderie over civil rights, bumpy roads to immigration and a wandering sense of home. In many ways, Trevor Noah feels Jewish. Rather than ostracize him for a few dumb jokes from five years ago, we should embrace his voice and hear it out. ■

Cape Breton Jewish community remembered in documentary

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of Carol Ann Davidson's most vivid memories of growing up on Cape Breton was singing in Sydney's Temple Sons of Israel choir with the musical Dubinsky family. Half the choir was made up of Dubinskys, who encouraged their extended family to attend synagogue and to sing. Dubinsky scion, Leon, became a prominent recording artist who worked with the Rankin Family and Rita McNeil.

"Their voices were beautiful," recalled Davidson. "It was special to sing in the choir."

The temple's revered rabbi, Israel Kenner, an opera lover, started the choir. "He was a major inspiration for the Jewish community," she said.

Nova Scotia's Cape Breton Island was home to a thriving Jewish community of some 400 families in the 1940s and '50s, who met for services at the temple in Sydney and at synagogues in Glace Bay, New Waterford and Whitney Pier, one of Sydney's oldest neighbourhoods. Davidson attended the last bar mitzvah held at the 109-year-old Glace Bay synagogue, Congregation Sons of Israel, before it closed in 2010.

At the bar mitzvah, Davidson, a Toronto broadcast journalist and travel writer, videotaped several interviews with mostly former Cape Breton Islanders, who reminisced about their lives on the island and spoke about the history of the Jewish community there.

Davidson said she realized the community was dwindling and that the time was right to make a documentary. Some 70 Jews currently live on Cape Breton and the one surviving synagogue, Temple Sons of Israel, established in 1919, has only 47 congregants.

Davidson got the ear of a CBC Radio producer, Steve Wadhams, who helped her create a radio documentary with her material. Davidson's 20-minute documentary, The Last Synagogue of Cape Breton, which aired on CBC radio recently, can be heard on the CBC Radio website.

Cape Breton's Jews were mainly of Russian origin. Davidson's paternal grandparents, escaping persecution in Russian, were the first recorded Jewish settlers on Cape Breton in the late 1880s.

In the documentary, Gertrude Shane speaks about her parents, who immigrated to Canada from Russia, settling in New Waterford in 1921. "My father was in the army at the time of the Russian Revolution. And after the Russian Revolution, the Bolsheviks took over and it was dangerous for my father to stay," she said.

Carol Ann Davidson

Shane's family chose Canada as their destination, since the United States, "afraid of Bolsheviks," she recalled, had closed its doors.

Shane added that it wasn't easy for an immigrant to get into Canada at the time, particularly if you were Jewish. "For Jews, it was even more difficult because there was prejudice against them."

Some of the Jewish immigrants started working in the coal mines of Cape Breton, but like Shane's father, they soon became pedlars and then merchants. While conducting interviews, Davidson was surprised to learn that one of the first languages some Jewish Cape Bretoners learned was Gaelic, the language their customers spoke.

The people Davidson interviews in the documentary say they rarely experienced anti-Semitism on Cape Breton "We always felt very well integrated," Davidson said, adding that the diverse community was made up of people who accepted one another's differences.

One glaring incident, however, was the anti-Semitism experienced by Davidson's father, Harold, a surgeon who wanted to join the golf club in Sydney after the war in the 1940s. The club didn't admit Jews, so her dad founded the Seaview Golf and Country Club, which was open to everyone.

The golf club still exists today, but the Jews of Cape Breton are mainly gone. Several people featured in the documentary left Cape Breton in the mid-1960s to attend university, as did Davidson. Without a university on the island and given the lack of job opportunities there, leaving "was bred in the bone," Davidson said.

Peddling often a first step for Jews in the New World

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

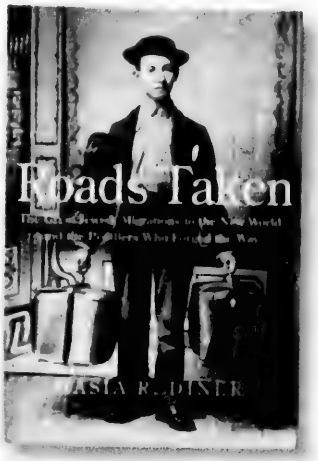
Pedlars, according to author Hasia R. Diner, were "the foot soldiers of the great migration" of Jews from eastern Europe and the Pale of Settlement to the lands of America, Canada, Britain, South Africa, Sweden and Australia from about 1780 to the 1920s, she writes in this bold, original and exhaustively researched study of Jewish pedlars.

Diner uses memoirs, autobiographies, literary accounts, diaries, oral histories, family narratives and a diversity of other sources to compile her study. Along every step of the road that this careful researcher treads, she makes sure to leave no stone unturned. The result is what one reviewer has perceptively termed "history from below," written from the vantage point of a lowly pawn rather than that of a king, queen, czar or emperor.

While many of us may believe that our grandparents or great-grandparents were pedlars, that may not have been true, at least not by Diner's definition. The push-cart vendors who plied their goods in large cities like Toronto, Montreal, New York and Buenos Aires were hawkers, not pedlars; street-corner merchants were also not pedlars, Diner writes, because they "did not perform the one act which unites all the pedlars of this book. They did not go into their customers' domestic spaces."

By bringing needed goods to the doorsteps of rural homes throughout the heartlands of America, Canada and other lands, pedlars performed a valuable service, especially for women, allowing them access to a wider range of consumer goods than before, sometimes even empowering them as consumers for the first time. Simultaneously, pedlars often provided their customers with their first actual encounter with a Jewish person. While engaged in selling their jumble of goods, the pedlars thus established a cultural bridge. Eventually many came to know their customers well enough to be invited to stay over in their homes.

Some veteran pedlars – such as Jacob Epstein of Baltimore, who sold jewelry, oilcloth, fabric for dresses, and patterns, pins, needles, thimbles and kitchenware from his Baltimore Bargain House – specialized in providing peddling supplies to newcomers. Epstein used to meet incoming ships at the docks and seek out the immigrant Jewish men as they disembarked. Then he would offer to set them up as pedlars, providing them with supplies and suggesting routes throughout the American South and mid-Atlantic coastal region.



Roads Taken: The Great Jewish Migrations to the New World and the Peddlers Who Forged the Way, by Hasia R. Diner
(Yale University Press)

The Jewish pedlar was a stock figure in literature, theatre, cartoons and folk humour, often representing "trickery, otherness and greed," Diner notes. One such figure appears in the Canadian classic novel, Anne of Green Gables; another more benign representation appears in Margaret Atwood's novel Alias Grace. The peddling life was certainly a lowly and gruelling one, but many saw it as preferable to wasting away in an oppressive sweatshop or labouring in a factory where work on the Sabbath was mandatory.

Diner walks us through the full life-cycle of the profession, from the moment the would-be itinerant trader arrives on foreign soil and is invariably assisted by a relative, friend or friendly stranger. Pedlars lived according to a weekly cycle, heading out by foot or wagon on Sundays or Mondays, visiting the customers' homes one by one, and returning home on Fridays.

Some pedlars went from rags to riches

Although many excelled at it, the routine was physically draining. Carried on the back, a pedlar's pack typically weighed 100 to 150 pounds.

For some, the job was shameful and humiliating. Diner cites a story of a pedlar who knocked on the door of a home in Concord only to discover that his Americanized son, a student at Harvard, happened to be visiting in the home.

"The father hastily collected his goods and left, not wanting his son to see him in such a servile position."

On another occasion, the same man, loaded down with his wares, boarded a train and was clattering down an aisle when he spotted his daughter with a group of her school friends. Terrified of embarrassing her, he quickly exited the train and waited for the next one. Newspaper reports of pedlar suicides were not uncommon.

In some towns, established shopkeepers resented pedlars for intruding into their commercial territories, and may have helped to generate ugly anti-pedlar campaigns that were tinged with racist rhetoric and violence; such crusades occurred in places such as Ireland, Quebec, Cuba and South Africa. Some American towns posted warning signs on their outskirts that proclaimed, "No Peddlers Allowed."

> In some towns, established shopkeepers resented pedlars for intruding into their commercial territories, and may have helped to generate ugly anti-pedlar campaigns that were tinged with racist rhetoric and violence

Besides the usual risks of road accidents or inclement weather, pedlars were mocked, arrested, chased, set upon by dogs, attacked, stoned, and even murdered.

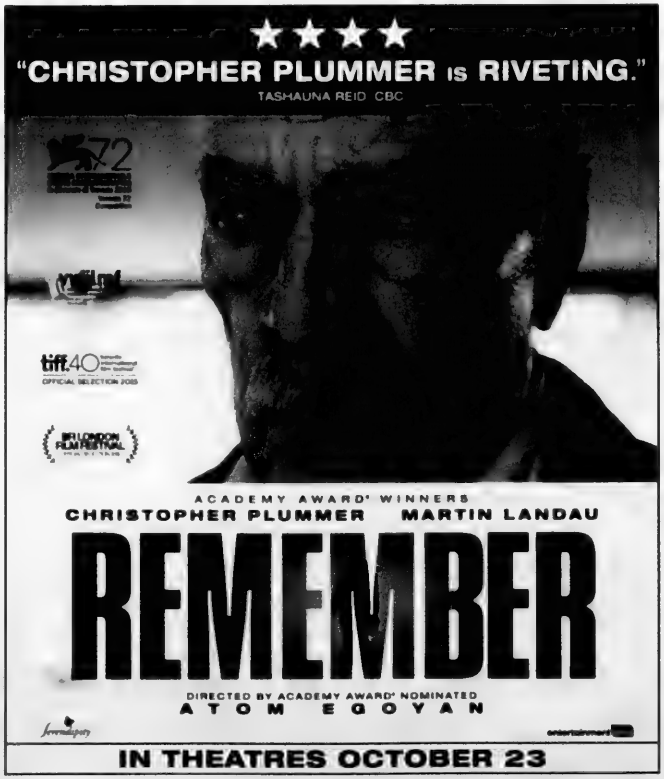
Despite these dangers, however, some ultimately found a path that led to success beyond their wildest dreams. While engaged in their itinerant lifestyle, pedlars often took on related occupations, becoming collectors of cast-off materials such as tin, bones, rags, bottles, paper and scrap metal, items that, while worthless to their former owners, could be sold in bulk at a profit. Others became pawnbrokers, money-lenders and, in the American South, cotton brokers.

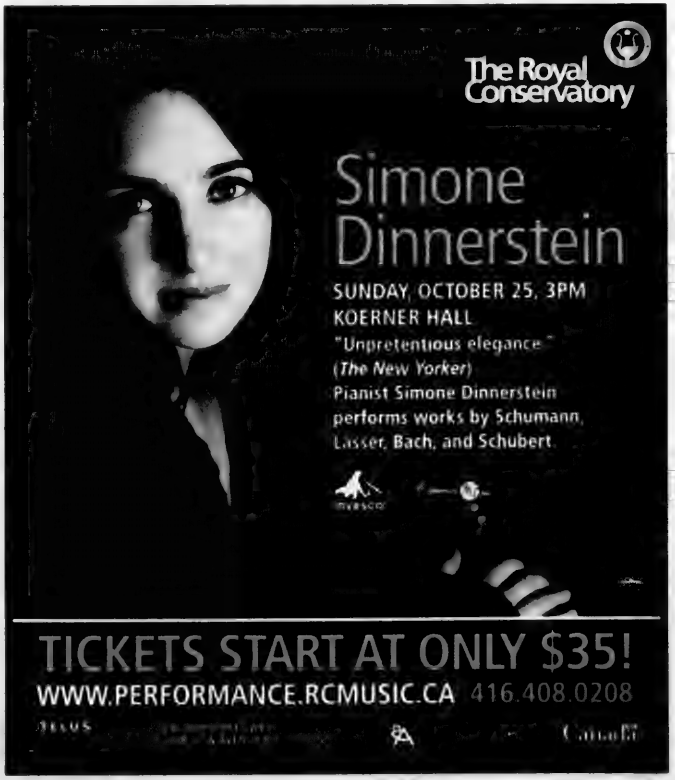
Such spin-off businesses sometimes became highly lucrative. Guggenheim, Lehman, Seligman, Straus and Eisner are the names of only a few of the legendary American businessmen from industrialists to department store moguls, who started as pedlars.

The book presents many such rags-to-riches stories. One of its dozen or so photographs is a portrait of Leon Koffler, seated in a horse-drawn buggy in Toronto in 1914; Koffler's two Toronto-area drug stores would become the genesis for the international Shopper's Drug Mart and Super-Pharm chains. Isaac Cohen, another pertinent Canadian example, was a pedlar in Kingston, Ont., who eventually built a major scrap-iron operation.

(My great-grandfather and several great-uncles worked for Cohen when they first arrived in Canada. After a couple of years, they moved to Maria Street in West Toronto Junction and established their own scrap-iron enterprise. It did well, but unfortunately, not to the degree of the scrap business operated by another Maria Street family, the Tanenbaums, which became a billion-dollar enterprise.)

Pedlar memoirs and narratives typically share the same theme. While offering an occasion for their writers "to congratulate themselves on the nation's essential goodness," they highlight America's or Canada's role as a land of opportunity and "celebrate the heroic notion of the self-made man." Transformed by success, the lowliest man on the professional totem-pole sometimes came to embody the highest of American ideals. ■





Canadian Jewish Literary Awards announces 2015 winners

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Among the winners announced for this year's Canadian Jewish Literary Awards are two authors with very different stories.

Alison Pick won in the biography category for her 2014 memoir Between Gods (Doubleday Canada), and Ryerson University professor Ruth Panofsky will take the prize in the Yiddish category for her work The Collected Poems of Miriam Waddington: A Critical Edition (University of Ottawa Press).

The awards ceremony, which will honour writers in a total of nine categories, including novel, scholarship, history, youth literature, poetry, Holocaust literature and short fiction, will be held Oct. 18 at the Tribute Communities Recital Hall at York University.

The Canadian Jewish Literary Awards were created last year to fill the void left when the Koffler Centre for the Arts, which long ran the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards, discontinued the event.

The goal is to pay tribute to what are deemed the best books written by Canadian authors across genres and featuring Jewish themes.

Between Gods chronicles the Toronto-based poet and Booker Prize-nominated author's journey to uncover her father's hidden Jewish roots, the stories of her relatives who perished in the Holocaust and her ultimate conversion, as an adult on the verge of marrying a non-Jewish man, from secular Christianity to Judaism.

Toronto author and poet Alison Pick wins Canadian Jewish Literary Award for her memoir Between Gods. EMMA LEE PHOTO

> I feel like it's a Jewish book in the sense that the main theme, for me, is my uncovering the family secret [of being Jewish].

But the story is also very much about Pick's recurring episodes of depression, her speculation about intergenerational trauma and relationship struggles.

"I feel like it's a Jewish book in the sense that the main theme, for me, is my uncovering the family secret [of being Jewish]. It's about me feeling a strong resonance with Judaism and making my way back to it," Pick explained.

As with any story that's told well, she said, the more particular details are woven into it, the more it paradoxically bears a kind of universal quality.

"People might to relate to the specific content of this struggle, but everyone can relate to the different themes [the book] includes regarding what it means to be human, to suffer, to face adversity, to find oneself. I think of this as both a Jewish and a universal book," she said.

Since finishing the memoir, which closes when Pick gives birth to a daughter, her life has been transformed by raising a child – and a Jewish child, at that, Pick said.

"There's taking her to shul, celebrating Jewish holidays, making Shabbat in our home. It's pretty cool to see the ways in which my daughter takes Judaism for granted in a way that I was never able to," she said.

Panofsky, a professor of English whose research includes Jewish Canadian writers, said she was "absolutely thrilled" to learn she'd won, though she admitted she was surprised to learn it was in the Yiddish category, which recognizes books either in Yiddish or about Yiddish culture.

"I was delighted the committee saw the importance of framing Waddington as a Yiddishist," Panofsky said.

The Collected Poems of Miriam Waddington is the first scholarly edition of the poetry of Waddington, a translator and the first Jewish Canadian woman to publish poetry written in Canada. She died in 2004.

In addition to 50 poems – both published and unpublished – that Panofsky selected from Waddington's archives, the two-volume collection includes various translations of poems that Waddington did from Yiddish, German and Russian into English.

Panofsky wrote the book's introduction, as well as supplementary notes.

"Many moons ago, as a young graduate student, I did my master's paper on Waddington's poetry. I met her at York University at the time, and she was kind and generous to me and encouraged me in my interest. We remained in contact over the years," Panofsky said.

She first took on the project of compiling Waddington's work as part of a collaborative project called Editing Modernism in Canada, which involves publishing works of poetry, fiction and non-fiction that were either never published or are long out of print.

"I accepted the offer somewhat naively not knowing how big a project it would become," Panofsky said. "But I love Waddington's poetry and this gave me a chance to go back and undertake new archival work of hers, which was terrifically interesting." ■

Jewish women new Canadian 50-plus tennis champs

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Francine Brock only wishes her late dad could have been there to see how the love of tennis he instilled in her finally paid off.

Brock and partner Dawn Tanzer are now the over-50 women's doubles champions in Canada after their win at the Steve Stevens Senior National Tennis Championships held in Montreal from Aug. 16 to 22.

This is the first national title for Brock, 55, and Tanzer, 51, who have been a team for more than 10 years, steadily capturing impressive showings at club and league tournaments, and a first-place finish for over-45s at the provincial level.

The duo is now qualified to compete at the world senior championships next June in Helsinki, Finland.

"This is quite an accomplishment for two Jewish girls from Montreal," Brock said. Tanzer added: "It's really cool, really neat. I'm glad I helped Francine make a dream come true."

She recalled how her father, Charles Bishinsky, spent many patient hours teaching tennis to his triplets – two daughters and a son – on the modest municipal courts in Chomedey.

The Tennis Canada-sanctioned Steve Stevens event drew almost 500 participants and was played on 32 outdoor courts at Montreal area tennis clubs, with $25,000 in prize money at stake. The age categories ranged from 35 to over 80.

That meant the competition was stiff, and it was the hottest, most humid days of the summer. Brock and Tanzer, who played four rounds on the Côte St. Luc Tennis Club, beat Marlene Hecker of Vancouver and Sandy Lee Mackie of Nova Scotia in the finals, 2-6, 6-2, 6-1.

In the semi-finals, they defeated the No. 1 seeds Dale Kozicz and Kathy Mueller of Toronto.

Brock and Tanzer, who play at the Hampstead Tennis Club in summer and the indoor Nuns' Island Tennis Club in the off-season, were the fifth-place seeds tied with three other pairs going into the tournament.

They are coached by Andreanne Martin, head pro at the Mount Royal Tennis Club, who won the over-45 women's singles and doubles.

Although officially an amateur meet, the Steve Stevens championships do include tennis teaching pros, and a number of former international-level players, including

Davis Cup alumni, were in the hunt.

Brock, who was an all-round athlete in her youth, came second in Quebec for her age group at 14, but then played only for fun later stopping altogether to work as a physiotherapist and raise two children.

In 2002, she got back into the sport after a 10-year layoff, with the full support of her husband Ian, who built her a court at their Ste. Agathe country home.

Of the many sports Brock engaged in as a youngster, she finds tennis the most exhilarating.

"I just love the high I get with a good shot," she said. "There's no feeling like it."

Tanzer, a mother of three, and Brock have different styles that complement each other. The latter is especially skilled at the net, while Tanzer plays a longer game.

"We are really opposites," said Tanzer. "Francine has finesse, she's really good with her hands. I'm more of a power player."

Tanzer also spent her childhood in Chomedey, but the two women only really got to know each other when their kids were in school together.

She was also athletic as a kid, but only played tennis at camp, never competitively.

"I like the exercise, the competition. Tennis is very social. It was obviously a lot of fun to play in the championships," said Tanzer, who before having children was athletic co-ordinator at the YM-YWHA. "But I think Francine is more excited than me."

Another Jewish winner at the championships was Brahm Faber, 82, who with partner Pierre Descoteaux won the men's over-80 doubles. Faber also placed third in the singles in his category.

He earned a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games in Israel last year. ■

Different survivor stories, common themes

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

When Canadian filmmaker Jules Arita Koostachin met Holocaust survivor Pinchas Gutter on a March of Remembrance and Hope trip that brings students to Poland and Germany to learn about the Holocaust, she felt an instant connection with him.

"We went to Poland and Germany with two Holocaust survivors. There were 20 of us. I became really close with Pinchas because he reminded me of my father," recalled Koostachin, an Attawapiskat First Nation member who was born in Moose Factory, Ont., and raised by her Cree-speaking grandparents in Moosonee, Ont., and her mother in Ottawa.

"We ended up being really close, and I followed him around. It was a really intense two weeks. We went to concentration camps and museums and monuments, and it was just an incredible, intense time."

She said having witnessed Gutter's emotions swing from anguished sobs to joyful singing, she felt a need to introduce him to her 72-year-old mother, Rita Okimawininew, a survivor of one of Canada's most notorious residential schools, where thousands of Aboriginal children were systematically abused physically, sexually and emotionally.

"It was incredible to see him crying, and then singing and dancing, and I thought, I really want him to meet my mom. I thought this is something my mom needs to see – that you can still sing and dance," Koostachin said.

Following her trip, Koostachin was inspired to write, produce and direct a 15-minute short documentary called Without Words – with little more than borrowed film equipment and a budget of $500 – which will be screened at imagineNATIVE Film + Media Arts Festival, the largest Indigenous media arts festival in the world, running Oct. 14 to 18 in Toronto.

Without Words tells two different survivor stories, but Koostachin said she was careful not to make it seem as though she was comparing the atrocities or the individual experiences.

"It is not a comparison of the trauma. What I wanted was to bring two very incredible elders together in story and look at the cross-cultural healing," she said.

Despite the fact that she did not want the two stories to be compared, she said there were common themes that emerged.

"They talk about forgiveness, they talk about having to hide their emotions. Pinchas talks about going to the concentration camp and losing his family, and my mom is talking about her mother not being with her when they put her on the boat with the other kids."

Koostachin said her mother was shipped off to a residential school when she was five years old, and when she came home at 16, she returned with a Grade 4 level education and a lifetime of traumatic memories.

"I've spent a long time working on my mom's story. When I was going to school, even when I was getting my master's, people weren't really speaking to that experience. We were speaking to it within our own families and communities, but publicly, there wasn't a lot of dialogue about it. People would say, 'Oh, that didn't really happen,' because it was swept under the rug for so long. There wasn't any real place to have that dialogue," she said.

"I tried to provide a platform for her to share her story, even though it's difficult for her and she's becoming more comfortable with it. It is such an important story to be shared. When I saw Pinchas dancing and singing, I thought about my mom, who I haven't really seen laugh. I haven't really seen her happy, I've never seen her in that place… So I brought them together for this film."

Koostachin, a woman who has balanced her film career with work in the social service sector, having worked in a women's shelter for Aboriginal victims of violence, said her inspiration behind the film was to humanize the traumatic stories and teach future generations about the history.

"Residential schools are only now coming to the forefront. The Holocaust, we still have survivors amongst us and their children and grandchildren. How do we learn from each other cross-culturally?" ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Digging up the ongoing mystery of Jerusalem

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

It's often said that almost anywhere you put a shovel into the earth in Israel, you will find historical relics. It's not literally true, of course, but it does happens with a frequency that seems remarkable to North Americans.

In the Givati parking lot a few hundred steps south of the Old City, for example, excavations have uncovered layer upon layer of city dwellings that range in time from the Second Temple period to the Middle Ages.

The bottom strata is presumed to be the royal palace of Queen Helene, a monarch who converted to Judaism about two millennia ago. Roman, Byzantine and Muslim remains are also layered into the site. Unearthed artifacts include a fabulous treasure-horde of some 264 shiny gold Byzantine-era coins.

By no means unique, the Givati parking lot is one of the most fertile of many new archeological sites that have been discovered in Israel in recent years. Having visited the Givati site this summer during a tour of the nearby City of David ("Ir David"), I wanted to learn the backstory of how Israel routinely processes its rich archeological heritage.

At the Israel Antiquities Authority's (IAA) large workshop in the industrial, high-tech suburb of Jerusalem of Har Hotzvim, I met with Elisheva Kamaisky, a senior conservator, who showed me some vessels she was reconstructing. Hundreds of dusty pottery shards lay on several work tables in her office, and thousands more were scattered across other tables along the building's long hallways. Besides pottery, conservators of relics of metal, glass and organic and stone materials also work in the IAA's Har Hotzvim labs.

"I'm working on a site called Eshtaol, near Beit Shemesh," she told me. "They're widening the road and they found this site from the early bronze period. We've got quite a nice selection of vessels here."

Typically, all work halts when archeological remains are discovered during highway repairs or the excavation of new buildings or infrastructure projects.

Mandated by law, an IAA crew arrives to document the site and remove all portable relics; only then is the site released back to the developer.

The IAA is a government body founded to oversee and protect Israel's archeological artifacts. Conservators must perform a sort of triage to determine which of the many artifacts that are discovered in the field get restored. Usually only the best ones get rebuilt; many others are studied, documented, and stored as numbered pieces in a drawer somewhere.

"We're working on vessels from the beginning of the invention of pottery from the start of the pottery neolithic age, which occurred about 8,000 years ago," said Kamaisky. Pottery, which is Kamaisky's specialty, can reveal much about a people's culture, from their technological proficiency to the extent of their trade routes, she explains.

At the Pequi'in burial cave in the Galilee, for example, archeologists found many clay ossuaries fashioned about 4500 BCE to hold the bones of the deceased.

Outstanding ossuaries on exhibit at Israel Museum and National Treasury

"They are so unique, so beautiful, so rich in artistic language, painting and three-dimensional sculpting," Kamaisky said. "To think that these people had the technological ability to build these vessels and to fire them – not just one or a few, but as an industry – is just amazing. I'm astounded by their artistic freedom."

The most outstanding ossuaries are now on exhibit in the Israel Museum and the others are in the National Treasury, a huge storage facility in central Israel where all of the portable finds of excavations are kept, and to which researchers are given access.

Down the hall, in the metal shop, Kamaisky introduces me to another conservator working on some antiquated pieces of jewelry and a horseshoe, probably from Roman times. "It's so diverse, all the materials that come through this lab."

Many finds, of course, are not portable and so must remain in the field. Days earlier, a family in Jerusalem had discovered during routine home renovations that a 2,000-year-old mikvah lay immediately beneath their living room.

> I'm astounded by their artistic freedom
> Elisheva Kamaisky

"We were involved in doing the scientific excavation and taking the dimensions and documenting it, and putting it into the overall context of the knowledge of Jerusalem in that period," Kamaisky said. "It's still there under that house and there is access to it. It's another piece that goes into the puzzle of the ongoing mystery of Jerusalem." ■

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Don't forget your influenza vaccination

Dr. Michael Gordon

It happens every fall season. Patients ask if they have to take the influenza vaccination "again," on the premise that, like so many other vaccines, especially the ones given in childhood, vaccinations should last for years.

Those who have paid attention over the years and have listened to their doctors – who likely have explained the reasons why yearly vaccination is imperative to decrease the risk of influenza infection – usually understand the reasons.

Unlike many of the childhood illnesses for which vaccination is required for protection, the influenza virus changes its character often. In childhood vaccines, where the virus does not change very often, once vaccinated, the body stores the knowledge of that virus, and when exposed to it, produces the body's correct antibodies to ward off the infection – mostly very efficiently as evidenced by the overwhelming success of childhood vaccination campaigns worldwide.

For complex reasons, the flu virus can change its makeup so that its antigens (identifying proteins) can change sufficiently that a previously formulated vaccine may not be effective with a new strain. Each year, immunologists and vaccine manufactures track the strains of the influenza virus, which often emerge in the Far East first, and after they identify the main strains, they manufacture a vaccine that often has three or four strains in it, effectively dealing with the most likely culprits in the usually worldwide epidemic of influenza illness.

Sometimes there is an error in identifying the dominant strains, which appears to be the case thus far this year. This means the success rate of immunization may be as low as 30 to 40 per cent, but that is better than no protection.

One of hears people say, "I never get the flu," or "I got the vaccine last year and then got the flu anyway," or "I got the vaccine and got a terrible reaction to it."

Although these events may occur, there are usually other explanations for what happened – such as the illness that occurred was not true influenza but another virus infection for which the vaccines are not protective.

One excuse that should have the least impact on people's decisions is the misconceived belief of those in the "anti-vaxxer" camp. Despite the clear evidence disproving any association between measles vaccine and childhood autism, the anti-vaxxers try to propagate various conspiracy theories that vaccines are promoted by the big vaccine corporations for profit motives and are in cahoots with governments and public health agencies.

Older people who have experienced the terrible childhood illness epidemics and the major influenza epidemics of the last century should be aware of the devastating effects of influenza and sometimes unnecessary deaths it can cause.

To emphasize the importance of the yearly vaccine, there is a recent study published in the Oct. 5 online issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association, one of the world's most prestigious medical publications. Researchers studied nearly 2,800 patients hospitalized for community-acquired pneumonia in four U.S. cities during three flu seasons.

The patients with influenza-associated pneumonia were significantly less likely than controls to have received the flu vaccine (17 per cent vs. 29 per cent). Dr. Thomas Schwenk, deputy editor of NEJM Journal Watch General Medicine, commented: "In addition to reducing the risk of hospitalization for influenza infection itself, influenza vaccination appears to reduce the likelihood of hospitalization for influenza-associated complications such as pneumonia. Perhaps the more telling piece of data in the study is that only 29 per cent of the overall population had been vaccinated, emphasizing the need for more effective delivery of preventive services."

The last sentence is the most telling – in an era of almost universal availability of a highly effective prevention of influenza, less than 30 per cent of that defined population took advantage of this marvellous miracle of modern medicine that decreases the likelihood of getting a potentially life-threatening illness with only the inconvenience of a minor injection.

Get it – don't find reasons to ignore the benefits of this simple and very effective preventative vaccination. ■

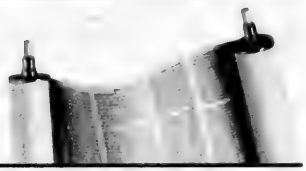
Noach | Genesis 6:9-11:32



Yacov Fruchter considers what it means to 'exit the lifeboat'
Rabbi Shalom Spira looks at the lessons of the Tower of Babel
Rachael Turkienicz explores the story of Noah's wife, Naamah

Yacov Fruchter

When given the list of those who will enter the ark, Noah is told: "You and your sons and your wife and your sons' wives" (6:18). The men are listed first. Why? Rashi explains that from this, we learn that marital relations were forbidden during the flood. God was implementing the first mechitzah – separation between men and women.

Rashi deduces this by comparing the above list to the order in which the groups are mentioned after the flood. They are now listed in couples: "Go out of the ark, you and your wife and your sons and your sons' wives with you" (8:16). Following the flood, they are again permitted to procreate.

Interestingly, later in the parshah, when we read about the covenant with Noah, Rashi offers a different perspective: "Noah worried about engaging in procreation until God promised him that he would not destroy the world again."

While we previously understood the abstention from sex to be adherence to a commandment, this second commentary from Rashi suggests that Noah and his wife were unwilling to bring any more children into the world unless they had a commitment from God that there would be no interference with the natural order to deliberately destroy creation and their children. This is reminiscent of the midrash that says our ancestors in Egypt stopped having children following Pharaoh's decree until the women bravely took the reins and reconnected with their husbands.

I am reminded of my own family history. My paternal grandparents lost three children during the Holocaust, and still found it within themselves to rebuild. My uncle was born in Russia in March 1945, and in 1951, less than six months after they arrived in Israel, my father Haim, literally and symbolically meaning life, was born. This parshah is an important reminder that no matter how difficult life is at times, we must "exit the lifeboat" and transition from survival to living. ■

The Tower of Babel (Genesis 11:1-9) bears a practical lesson whose precise nature merits analysis, as follows.

The Gemara, Chagigah 15b, expounds upon Isaiah 33:18 ("where is he who counts the towers") as referring to scholars fluent in "three hundred halachot regarding a flying tower." Rashi offers several interpretations: (a) When a scribe writes a lamed too high, thereby threatening the calligraphic integrity of the overhanging line, the lamed is metaphorically called "a flying tower." (b) The Tower of Babel. (c) The calculation of whether or not corpse impurity will spread from one room to another in a tower.

Interpretations (a) and (c) reflect our quotidian experience. We have seen scribes correct all sorts of orthographic blunders, and we have heard of hospitals struggling to determine whether or not kohanim may enter the premises. But what is the meaning of (b)?

Perhaps we may gain insight from the parallel Gemara in Sanhedrin 106b. There, Rashi replaces (b) with two clearer options: (b1) the debate [in Nazir 55a] whether a passenger sealed within a vehicle that overflies a cemetery is shielded from contamination, and (b2) expertise in the various ways that sorcerers levitate objects (including towers), as per Sanhedrin 68a, that although a Jew may never practice paranormal crafts, he can study wizardry in order to understand how to avoid it.

The Tower of Babel architects sought to achieve global unity, both geographic and linguistic. Such harmony is indeed a most noble goal, whose pursuit is guided by appropriate halachic caveats. First, when traversing geographic frontiers, we must ascertain whether our vehicles are overflying cemeteries, as elaborated by Rabbi J. David Bleich (Tradition 36:4). Second, when we speak with the nations of the world, our dialogue must be limited to the secular welfare of humankind, as enunciated by Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveitchik (Tradition 6:2). ■

Rachael Turkienicz

One of the best-known stories in the Torah is Noah's Ark. We read of Noah, his family and all the animals saved in the ark while God floods the world. When Noah and his wife emerge from the ark, they become the new Adam and Eve, and the world is reborn through them.

For two people who are so important to humanity, it's interesting that we only know the name of one of them. Who is Noah's wife?

The sages state that Noah's wife is Naamah, a descendant of Cain. In fact, the list of Cain's descendants culminates with a woman named Naamah.

One might conclude that the sages have deliberately included Cain's "killer gene" in Naamah. In that way, she is paralleled to Eve, who ate the forbidden fruit and brought death into the world. But why have a second Adam and Eve if they are doomed to repeat the actions of the first? What would be gained?

Interestingly, the sages point out a tremendously redemptive aspect to Cain. After an honest confrontation with God, Cain owns his sin and realizes the significance of what he has done. In the end, Cain repents.

Cain is the first human being to sin and repent, and this trait will be lost to humanity if his line disappears. Naamah is identified as Noah's wife and is specifically descended from Cain so that all of humanity will inherit the ability to be accountable and repent.

Noah is the descendant of Adam and Eve's son, Seth. According to the sages, Adam and Eve were so traumatized by the death of their son Abel that they separated for many years. They finally reconciled and gave birth to a third son, Seth.

Noah and Naamah become the new Adam and Eve, but they represent very different things. The world has a chance for healing because Naamah represents repentance and Noah represents reconciliation. ■

A happenstance culinary trip

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Vancouver is a wonderful city to visit. It is known for its mild weather, the vistas of the city, the mountains and the ocean, its parks, beaches and marvellous outdoor activities, to name a few attractions.

My husband and I were recently in Vancouver for the graduation of our youngest son, Warren, from the University of British Columbia's faculty of medicine. We are very proud of him and thrilled that after being away three years for undergrad and four years for medical school, he is finally returning to Toronto for his residency in internal medicine here at the University of Toronto.

When we visited Warren in Vancouver, we spent some time with him experiencing Vancouver's culinary side. We started by enjoying luscious cake at UBC Convocation Hall, overlooking the famous rose garden and the wonderful view of the ocean and the mountains. We discovered that Vancouver's dining scene is filled with restaurants that use local, seasonal and organic ingredients and offer quite a good selection of vegetarian and vegan options. One beautiful evening, we visited Seasons In The Park, a beautiful venue with an amazing view of downtown Vancouver and the mountains behind it.

There are abundant, wonderful farmer's markets – my favourite being Granville Island Public Market. Local markets showcase a fascinating assortment of colourful booths boasting fresh from the field organic and locally sourced produce, as well as fresh from the ocean fish and straight from the oven baked goods. The local Vancouver markets are also a perfect place to learn from the food artisans about how well you can eat if you buy local. Not to mention, a fantastic place to have lunch or snack a bit and purchase terrific gifts for family and friends.

Vancouver coffee is highly regarded as an art form. There are, of course, the major chains, like Starbucks, but many quaint and character-filled boutique coffee shops line Vancouver's streets as well.

Food trucks are wildly popular in Vancouver serving such favourites as grilled cheese, kebabs and tacos. Japadog sells Japanese-style hot dogs, with Japanese toppings. The hot dogs can be meat or vegetarian and the toppings include seaweed (nori), Japanese mayo, grated daikon (radish), bonito flakes (dried, fermented and smoked skipjack tuna), miso, Japanese coleslaw, plain shredded cabbage, terimayo sauce, (teriyaki sauce mixed with mayonnaise) and Japanese noodles.

If you have not experienced all that Vancouver has to offer, it's time to make plans to visit. Your eyes and your stomach will have an awesome time.

Dr. Joel Sadavoy: helping people cope with dementia

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The World Health Organization estimates that more than 47 million people are living with dementia worldwide, and that number is expected to reach 75 million by 2030. In Canada, more than 700,000 people have some form of dementia.

DementiaHack is a project supported by Facebook, the British, Canadian and Ontario governments that aims to help dementia sufferers and their caregivers by identifying "real-time immediate and tangible products and services…and turbocharg[ing] them to market," said DementiaHack chair Jordan Banks, managing director of Facebook Canada.

On Oct. 3, a workshop was held at the MaRS Discovery District in Toronto featuring a panel of researchers, caregivers and people living with dementia who gathered to share insights with technologists and developers. It was the lead-up to the DementiaHack Hackathon, a technology conference that takes place Nov. 7 to 9 at George Brown College in Toronto.

The CJN spoke with DementiaHack panelist Dr. Joel Sadavoy, director of the Reitman Centre for Alzheimer's Support and Training and head of the geriatric and community psychiatry programs at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

What is dementia?

Dementia is an umbrella term that refers to impairments in brain functioning that interfere with core mental abilities, particularly memory and the ability to understand and comprehend, to speak, and to carry out actions both simple and complex. The term encompasses a variety of specific illnesses, so there are different kinds of dementia. One of those is Alzheimer's disease, which is the largest component of dementia, but there are several others, such as vascular dementia, frontotemporal dementia, and Lewy body dementia. All have the same kinds of impact overall on these core functions of the brain. In addition, because of those changes, there are almost universally behavioural changes that occur, and while they're not considered core symptoms of dementia, they're so common they might as well be. However, they vary from person to person.

Why are you participating in DementiaHack?

I'm particularly interested in finding a way to enhance what goes on behind the scenes in people's homes, which is at the core of the difficulties they have in managing on a day-to-day basis. I am also fascinated by the idea that we can bring together perhaps hundreds of creative brains to address a topic that has remained very much in the shadows until relatively recently.

What kinds of therapy-based skills for caregivers are available?

Caregivers need accurate information and education, as well as practical services, respite care, in-home personal support workers, and aids of various sorts – which is where most of the resources, training and skill development for dealing with dementia go. We train practitioners to do this work, but we never train family caregivers, and they're the ones who have to deal with this. The most effective thing we have right now is interpersonal connection and interaction, which is what families do, and it's really one member of the family that has to do this more than others. Those people are untrained and not educated about the disease, and they don't quite know how to navigate the system to get the resources they need.

However, equally and often more so, they don't have the skill sets to address the problems that come up: the aggression, the paranoia, the wandering, the agitation, the resistance to taking medication or not having a shower. There is no or very little attention paid anywhere to the emotional needs of caregivers. If caregivers are not effective in this role, then it will cripple our health care system.

There are very few therapies in place to help these caregivers. There are support services and education programs, but education, we've found, is not the most important element. It is actually both skills training and emotional management – they are the two most important elements. For those to happen, they have to be quite specific to the needs of individual families and caregivers, because dementia looks different in one family versus another. The Reitman Centre is the only one place I know of that does that kind of systematic approach to skills training in problem-solving and sustaining emotional capacity in caregivers.

Is there treatment for dementia?

There's no cure for dementia. Medications might slow things down a little bit. Very occasionally, people will respond with some observable improvement, but that is unusual. Medications exist for the secondary effects of dementia – some people get depressed, some people get agitated, or paranoid, or psychotic, and they lose touch with reality. Sometimes the medications we have can be effective temporarily for those things, but there are lots of side effects, so we have to be very cautious about how we use them. Medication is really not the answer for dementia. We don't have a medication that I would say is substantially effective. The cognitive approaches are, I think, largely in the experimental stage.

You manage dementia. You understand the elements of it. The goal is really to maintain as much human engagement and interaction with somebody as possible. Dementia goes in stages. In the early stages, the relationship, communication and engagement are relatively normal. You can talk to somebody with early dementia and they make sense – they understand, and while there are some deficits in their abilities to do certain things, their personhood remains very much evident.

As the disease progresses, it eats away at individuals' core functions, and often at their personalities as well. Their ability to make themselves known, to communicate, and to maintain a relationship with others, starts to get damaged. As that happens, they require a different kind of engagement with the world. They can't do it by themselves any longer, so they need a partner. They're not going to partner fully with a personal support worker that comes in seven hours a week, so their partner in the management of dementia is going to be somebody close to them. Usually, that middle phase happens at home.

Treatment involves partnering with someone who can understand the needs of the patient and do things they can't do for themselves, as well as maintaining the relative health and activity and human engagement of the individual. This is much more than just chicken-soup support. It's actually very hard work, because the caregiver has to think for two at every turn: What's he going to eat? How is he going to eat? Can I get food? Can I get the medications into him? Does he need medication? Do I have to take him to the hospital? Is he sick? Does he need a shower? Does he have to go out? Should I take him to the doctor? What time should he go to bed? What time should he wake up?

Is dementia hereditary?

Partly. Genetics is not the most important thing, but there are some genes associated with dementia. We're searching a lot for genes in dementia, but we haven't really found convincing evidence that the majority of dementia is hereditary. Some kinds of dementia run in families, but it's a very small number. Perhaps five per cent of the dementias are hereditary, Alzheimer's disease in particular.

Are there tools for early identification, assessment and treatment?

We are much better at early identification than we are at doing anything about it. We can image the brain with PET scanning and functional MRI, and, increasingly, we can identify people who are at risk of getting dementia or who have it in the earliest stages. You can also identify them with psychological tests. Sometimes, just by doing an assessment on the basis of their functioning day-to-day, we can tell when things are starting to slip. Nevertheless, once we do that, we have very little to offer. Right now, what we're offering are lifestyle changes, recommendations for diet, exercise – all the things that are good for the heart you would also do to make the brain feel better.

It's thought that dementia probably starts 20 or 30 years before the disease actually becomes identifiable, and there are some factors that are probably related to various forms of dementia, such as blood flow problems, which may be amenable to lifestyle change. So keeping your blood pressure under control, keeping cholesterol low, exercising, eating one of those great diets like the Mediterranean diet – all those things are probably useful.

There may also be some use in tuning up the intellectual side of the brain. There is some data that the more highly educated people are, the more they're protected. I don't think it actually protects against getting the disease, but it may push the worst effects forward so that they emerge a bit later in life. I would say the most effective things are those things people really like to do. It is probable that novel social interactions of various sorts – where we are stretching our brains and engaging with people and thinking out of the box – are beneficial. That kind of creativity is probably a lot more effective than brain gyms or any other games, but I'd say if you love crosswords – do them. ■

Sam Factor's stunning victory

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The results of the 42nd federal election will be known on Oct.19. Whether it will lead to a change in power in Ottawa remains to be seen.

Such a momentous change occurred in the 17th federal election on July 28, 1930, when as the Great Depression began, William Lyon Mackenzie King and the Liberals were swept from office by R.B. Bennett and the Conservatives.

For decades, Toronto had been solid Tory and it was expected that Conservative candidates would win in all nine Toronto-area ridings. On election day, that prediction came to pass, except in the riding of Toronto West Centre, which incorporated the Spadina and Kensington Market neighbourhood. Rather miraculously, Samuel Factor, a 37-year old Jewish lawyer who served on Toronto city council, defeated former Toronto mayor Tommy Church, who had been a member of Parliament since 1921. Factor won by 564 votes over Church and received 49 per cent of the vote. He was Ontario's first Jewish MP.

Toronto's Jewish population was about 45,000 in 1930 and many of those who lived in the Toronto West Centre riding no doubt voted for Factor, who spoke Yiddish and had a working-class background. Yet the post-election celebration was also an important moment for many of the city's immigrants.

The festivities carried on into the wee hours of the evening around College Street and Spadina Avenue. Factor stopped in to Rubin's restaurant and Wexler's Café and was greeted by adoring supporters. "Thousands of Jewish, non-Jewish and Italian voters created a dense traffic jam at Dundas and Bathurst Streets, when early returns showed Alderman Factor leading," reported the Globe. "When the returns showed that the alderman had won...the crowd broke down the door [of Factor's] committee room seized the alderman, shouldered him, and started down Dundas Street to the Hebrew Journal, where he made a brief address."

Factor had come to Toronto from czarist Russia in 1902 with his parents when he was 10 years old. He grew up in "the Ward," the downtown and impoverished immigrant quarter. He graduated high school from Jarvis Collegiate Institute and then studied law at Osgoode Hall as a scholarship student. In 1915, he became a lawyer during an era when Jews in the profession still faced discrimination. Two years later in the midst of World War I he left his law practice and enrolled in an officer training program becoming a lieutenant. He also later served in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II.

His career as a politician began in 1923 with his election as a Toronto Board of Education school trustee. Three years after that he won a seat on city council for Ward 4, the Kensington Market neighbourhood; he served alongside Nathan Phillips, who was to become the city's first Jewish mayor in the civic election of 1954.

Church, meanwhile, was surprised but gracious in defeat (he won a by-election in 1934 and remained in Parliament until the 1950s).

Factor went on to serve as a MP for the next 15 years, winning in the new riding of Spadina in the 1935 election, when King and the Liberals were re-elected to power, and then again in the 1940 election. He worked with two other Jewish MPs, Sam Jacobs of Montreal and A.A. Heaps from Winnipeg, to lobby King to permit more German Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi rule to emigrate to Canada—yet to no avail. King considered appointing Factor to the cabinet in July 1940, until that idea met with resistance from his less tolerant Quebec colleagues.

In 1945, Factor graciously stepped aside so that David Croll, an Ontario Liberal MPP could run in Spadina. Croll served in the provincial cabinet, the first Jewish politician to do so in the country. Factor was appointed a judge and served with distinction on the Ontario bench for many years. A compassionate jurist, he believed that drug addicts should be sent to a hospital rather than jail, and urged the federal government to change the law.

He died in Toronto in 1962 at 69, still remembered for his stunning victory in the 1930 election. ■

Misunderstanding at Jays game, and graffiti artists express themselves

Jewish developers avoid ejection

Ex-Toronto Argonauts owner Howard Sokolowski and fellow Jewish property developer Ed Sonshine were nearly ejected from the Rogers Centre in Game 7 of the American League Division Series after Texas Rangers manager Jeff Banister said they tossed beer into the team's dugout. Banister mistakenly accused the pair during an unruly seventh inning in which fans tossed projectiles onto the field to protest a call against the Toronto Blue Jays that put them behind by a run. Sokolowski's wife, Sen. Linda Frum, tweeted Oct. 15 that after pleading their case in an exchange shown on national TV, police and stadium security let them stay.

Homeland hacked

Arabic-speaking artists hired to add Arabic graffiti to the set of the U.S. cable series Homeland said Oct. 14 they'd "hacked" the Oct. 11 episode by calling the show racist in the scrawls. The artists said in an online posting that the series is known as "the most bigoted show on television for its inaccurate, undifferentiated and highly biased depiction of Arabs, Pakistanis and Afghans, as well as its gross misrepresentations of the cities of Beirut, Islamabad and the so-called Muslim world in general." In the episode, central character Carrie Mathison, played by Claire Danes, walks through a Syrian refugee camp built in a Berlin set, past Arabic graffiti with messages such as "Homeland is racist" and "Homeland is a joke, and it didn't make us laugh." Homeland is based on the Israeli series Hatufim (Prisoners of War). Both were created by Gideon Raff.

Raising the bar in Tel Aviv

A leading publication on alcohol ranked an Israeli pub on its list of the world's 50 best bars for the first time. Drink International put Tel Aviv's Imperial Craft Cocktail Bar at No. 17 on its list, published earlier this month. The same bar, on Hayarkon Street in central Tel Aviv near the U.S. Embassy, was already ranked last year by Drinks International as the best in Africa and the Middle East, but ranked 56th on the worldwide list. This year, it retained its regional title and completed the biggest jump of all the establishments ranked, Ha'aretz reported. ■

Mixed feelings about refugees

I imagine I am not alone in having conflicted feelings.

For ages, many democratic governments have supported tyrants because they were on our side and/or they kept order in their countries. While, in principle, I was pleased that the likes of Moammar Gadhafi and Saddam Hussein were executed for their crimes, among the very few modern tyrants who have received justice, two things are evident. One is that Libya and Iraq are failed states right now, and many of their people have one thing in common: an irrational hatred of Israel, if not Jews.

So, with the exception of Iraqi Kurds, it is hard to have sympathy for the population of many of these countries.

That brings us to Syria, where President Bashar Assad, along with his father, has killed more Muslims than Jews have since the beginning of time. His opponents in the uncivil civil war include Al Qaeda and ISIS, among the savage Islamist groups who also despise Israel and Jews. Again, there are no good guys here, except maybe the Kurds, who are far more worthy of statehood and justice than the Palestinians, but are ignored by the world.

Now Europe is being flooded by refugees from failed states. Yet in Canada, we hear only about helping the Syrians, who must certainly include Jew-haters (I prefer this accurate term to the "anti-Semitic" euphemism).

My synagogue, Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal, will sponsor a Syrian family. I mildly approve, but I am conflicted. But I believe the best attitude was revealed in The CJN story "Mindful of risks, Europe's Jews urge aid to refugees" (Sept. 17). In it, Rabbi Zoltan Radnoti of Hungary stated that he actively helps the refugees, knowing that he may be aiding people who may hurt other Jews in Europe, or who may have fired on Israeli soldiers or would have done so in a heartbeat.

Then he states the key to it all. "I know. But I am duty-bound to help."

God bless him! He is both an inspiration and a better Jew than I.

Niqab hinders communication

I couldn't disagree more with Danielle Kubes ("When it comes to the niqab debate, where are the Jews?" Oct. 8). The niqab uniquely hides all messages related to emotion, mental well-being, personality and mood.

It's not fear that drives our resistance and mistrust of the niqab, it's millions of years of evolution. Neither turbans nor kippot nor wigs worn by some married Jewish women cover that essential and unique form of communication which is the human face.

Catholic-Jewish friendships

It was with great pleasure that I read Rev. Damian MacPherson's guest column on the impending 50th anniversary of Nostra Aetate ("Jews and Catholics: a pilgrimage to partnership," Oct. 8).

The changes wrought by Nostra Aetate constitute, to borrow a portion of the title of Gilbert Rosenthal's excellent book, a truly Copernican Revolution. I have personally witnessed some of these changes.

I have a powerfully strong recollection of how, at the age of eight or nine, my best friend showed me his workbook in which he and others in his class at the local Catholic school were taught that the Jews killed Jesus. It didn't have much effect on either one of us, but it was a rough neighbourhood, and being labelled as a Christ-killer didn't help. Getting beaten up on the way home from school was already a regular occurrence.

This sort of Catholic-on-Jewish bullying simply doesn't happen anymore. Or if it does, it elicits a strong response from both communities. In the space of 50 years, well within my lifetime, we've gone from systemic anti-Semitism within the Roman Catholic Church to greater understanding and friendship. Of course, no relationship is without its bumps, but look how far we have come.

Majestic documents such as Nostra Aetate have acted as fundamental game-changers in Catholic-Jewish relations and it is from within this relatively new tradition that successive popes have built and broadened the bridge between our two communities. Such changes leave me, without minimizing present challenges and difficulties, hopeful for the future of our relationship with other communities as well.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Talking theology in a house of God

Are there measures communities can take to encourage this conversation? And if we can't discuss belief in synagogue, where can it be discussed?

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Cutler: Recently, a congregant emailed me Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith, and asked if I agreed with all of them. I replied in one word, "no." Similarly, I recently met with a woman and her Jewish partner regarding her interest in conversion to Judaism. Before concluding the meeting, the boyfriend asked me a series of questions about my beliefs regarding the age of the world, the origin of the Torah and the existence of God.

These moments stand out for me, because I am so rarely asked about my personal beliefs regarding fundamental religious issues. These incidents forced me to question the extent to which a rabbi's theology is important for his or her community.

Rabbis are evaluated by many criteria. Perhaps for a rabbi who is strong on many fronts – pastoral, preaching, teaching, etc – theology is simply not an important criteria for evaluation. Or are we not inviting the conversation? Are we not open about our core beliefs, fearing that we will seem out of touch or maybe too radical?

How do you share your fundamental beliefs with your community? Do you worry that you may offend or push away congregants who hold a different truth?

Rabbi Scheier: It is true that our sermons and teachings focus more on how to be "God-like" than on how to be "God-believing."

Maimonides' influence on Jewish thought brought dogma to the fore. In fact, the Talmud does not record a comprehensive list of Jewish principles. It was Maimonides who insisted that agreeing with principles of belief are a prerequisite to being a member of the community. The irony you point out holds true: in all of the ways that congregations often grill potential rabbinic candidates, belief is rarely addressed.

I am reminded of the joke about the shul-going atheist who is asked why he attends synagogue. The atheist points to a religious Jew, Garfinkel. "You see Garfinkel?" he says. "Garfinkel comes to talk to God. I come to talk to Garfinkel."

That said, I don't shy away from speaking about God. I am aware that conversations about theology may be foreign turf for many of our members, but if we can't discuss theology in synagogue, where can it be discussed?

Do you think there are measures communities can take to encourage this conversation?

Rabbi Cutler: I am now beginning my third year leading Havurat HaSefer, a modern Jewish philosophy reading group. At its best, this group, which meets every three weeks, not only reads and discusses great works, but also takes the opportunity to reflect upon them. I try to lead by example, not only serving as an explicator of text, but by speaking openly as a Jew whose theology is in flux.

I wonder if we created a safe space with excellent facilitators over a course of months or years whether we could empower a cadre of deep religious reflectors. For me, it would seem that it would have to be clear from the outset that no ideas are too foreign, no suggestions too radical. Facilitators would have to be knowledgeable enough to guide participants to thinkers whose ideas resemble their own. Rabbis would have to be comfortable enough to suggest books that may fall outside the stances of their own denominations (if not Judaism entirely).

How would you go about devising conversations on foundational issues of Jewish belief?

Rabbi Scheier: I think you are right that one begins discussing faith by exploring texts.

In the past, I have taught a class on belief using the text The God I Believe In, a 1994 book by Joshua Haberman that invited 14 prominent Jewish figures to pontificate about belief. I wonder if it might be a worthwhile project for our Canadian community to produce a similar volume, one that would explore the inner spiritual workings of our community's spiritual, political and cultural leaders.

My wife, Maharat Abby Brown Scheier, often teaches that Jewish faith doesn't address the present, it points to the future. To be a believing Jew means to believe that the future will be better. This idea stands behind the concept of the Messiah, and it is what motivates so much of what we do as rabbis and as a community. ■

In sermons and other writings, as well as in his further reflections written for this book, John Moscowitz charts the shifts in his thinking on the important matters among Jews today. Part memoir, part social history, "Evolution of an Unorthodox Rabbi" is a deep examination of one rabbi's personal journey, one traveled in public over twenty-five years. Along the way it captures what unites and divides contemporary people today.

In Israel, terror and frustration abound

Last Thursday, a Jerusalem resident posted a photo of an empty park on Facebook. The accompanying caption read: "This is a park in a very safe and 'comfortable' neighbourhood where I usually take my boys after work. On a normal day at 430 pm [sic] the park is PACKED with kids and parents. Look at it!!!!! people are scared to take their kids to a park in Talbia!!!!!"

Such is life in Israel right now, where every day brings new terror attacks against Jews. As the knife assaults and shooting sprees continue, it's hard to feel safe. More and more Israelis are carrying pepper spray or mace, or packing a gun when they're out and about, just in case.

It is a terrifying situation, and also a frustrating one, since there appears to be no solution in sight. Thousands more soldiers and security personnel have been deployed to the streets, bus stops, shopping malls and Israel's borders. Temporary walls have been installed, dividing Jerusalem's Jewish and Arab neighbourhoods. And yet, most experts agree there is little hope this latest wave of terror will end anytime soon.

The genesis of the violence is rooted in a bald-faced lie – Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' assertion, despite all evidence to the contrary and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's public insistence, that the Israeli government is attempting to change the status quo on the Temple Mount. Abbas has shown no shame in piling lies on top of lies, including his malicious claim that Israeli security personnel shot and killed an innocent Palestinian boy. In fact, 13-year-old Ahmed Mansra had stabbed and critically injured two Israelis, one of them a boy of nearly the same age as him, before he could be stopped. Mansra wasn't dead, either – photos showed him recovering in an Israeli hospital from a head injury.

It's hard to see how anyone could be deceived by such blatant fraud, and yet many have been, including some media outlets, our own Canadian Broadcasting Corporation among them. From headlines that suggest ruthless Israelis are murdering innocent Palestinians, to inaccurate on-the-scene coverage from reporters who should know better, it's difficult to understand how so many obvious journalistic mistakes could be committed. It almost makes you wonder whether some of those spreading these lies in the media are doing it on purpose.

But what can Israel do? There is no one to talk to about peace on the Palestinian side, and no clear method to curtail the violence, at least not yet. In the meantime, sales of pepper spray, tear gas and handguns are on the rise. It may not be a solution, but it's the best anyone has been able to come up with so far.

Essay

Realizing Yitzhak Rabin's vision

DJ Schneeweiss
and Lior Hameiri

Nov. 4 marks the 20th anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's former prime minister, by a fellow Israeli Jew, Yigal Amir.

This is a difficult day for all Israelis.

Against the background of the bitter ideological divide that both preceded the assassination, and followed it, this is a day which forces us to ask ourselves deep questions about what kind of society we are and want to be, and how we realize our national dreams when there is no consensus as to how to do so, or even as to what they are.

For many, this is a day which requires that we renew our commitment to peace between Israel and its neighbours.

This we do, wholeheartedly. Despite the hostility and the terror and the incitement and the hatred, despite the rockets and the tunnels and the denial of our connection to Jerusalem, the search for a peace that will guarantee the security and prosperity of the Jewish state Rabin clearly loved remains at the heart of our national agenda and of our people's yearning.

But there are other crucial lessons to be learned as well, including the need to stand vigilant against incitement, hatred and intolerance, and the violence these excesses so easily beget.

As we look back over the 20 years since that wrenching Saturday night, there is much to be proud of in the way Israeli society has dealt with the wounds, in the way we collectively pulled back from the brink and rebuilt our social and political contract.

Profound efforts have been made, by the government and by civil society, to ensure that this anniversary is a time which fosters unity. Official ceremonies are held and educational programs conducted in schools. People of different viewpoints come together to remember and reaffirm, to mourn and to sing, to listen and to learn.

We understand that we don't have to reach agreement on everything in order to work together to advance our country and our society, and we know that we must foster tolerance and mutual respect always, even – and particularly – when we disagree over fundamental issues.

Here in Toronto, the Israeli Consulate together with the Israel Engagement Committee of UJA Federation have initiated a project to promote these values of acceptance and partnership. Building on the work of the Gesher movement in Israel, we are working to create opportunities for mifgash – encounters between Jewish schools here in the city.

Next week, Grade 8 students from Jewish elementary schools from different religious/ideological streams will meet – most for the first time in their lives - in "dialogue tents" specially set up so that they can become acquainted with each other and learn about each other's views on matters of mutual interest.

Twenty-four young Israeli emissaries – shinshinim – embedded in the community through the UJA's Israel Engagement committee's work will facilitate these discussions.

None of these young Israelis ever knew Rabin or saw him in person, or experienced the feelings and emotions which engulfed us after the assassination. It is therefore particularly moving and inspiring to see them take on the responsibilities of bearing the torch of collective memory and collective purpose, so that our people can continue to learn from our past, as we build our future.

Why use the Rabin anniversary to foster this internal Jewish dialogue here in Toronto? We believe there are two compelling reasons:

Firstly, because this community can be deeply enriched by connecting with the dilemmas and challenges that Israelis face as we seek to build a democratic and Jewish society which lives up to our people's best aspirations. Just as we do with the official Memorial Ceremony for Yom Hazikaron and many other educational initiatives and events in the community calendar, we believe it is important to make Israeli life and reality as accessible and intelligible as possible to the Jewish community as a whole.

And secondly, because the lessons of this tragedy apply not just to Israelis, but to all Jews.

There is no "mine" or "yours" here. Israel doesn't only belong to Israelis, it belongs to the entire Jewish people. Even though our lives are often very different, we are one, and our need to allow for difference among us - the same.

It is our hope that this student dialogue initiative will become a permanent fixture in the community calendar and a model for even more engagement with Israel.

The new generation and the old, left and right, Israelis and Jews – all of us must work together to promote the unity of the Jewish people irrespective of which passports we travel on or which political platform we subscribe to, or which school we send our kids to. We must all work as one to promote tolerance and acceptance of those among us with whom we disagree, to enhance our own personal involvement and engagement with Israel and to help it to become the just, secure and peaceful society that we all yearn for.

If we act together, then the coming generations who may not have known Rabin will at least be able to enjoy the realization of his vision. ■

Israel is on edge – again

Sagi Melamed

"Mom freaked me out this morning!" said my 16-year-old son Ari. "I was leaving for school, half-asleep as usual, and Mom was just coming home after her morning run. Suddenly she yelled, 'Ari, look out!' I jumped out of my skin, thinking a terrorist with a knife was in our doorway… then I realized it was just my little sister's cat trying to sneak into the house."

My friend Shmulik told me on Shabbat, "Yesterday I reviewed the techniques you taught us in karate class to defend myself against a knife attack, after rocks were thrown on the street in Haifa where my office is." Near the cafeteria at Yezreel Valley College I met R., an Israeli Arab employee from a small village near Afula. I asked, "What do you think is going to happen?" With a concerned look he said, "Wallah, I don't know. Our village is as supportive of coexistence as you could imagine. We serve in the IDF [R. himself was in the Golani Brigade], we're integrated and we feel part of the fabric of Israeli society. But now we're scared some Jews from Afula will attack us in revenge for the two stabbing attacks by Arabs because they won't distinguish between good people and evil."

Right now the nerves of Israelis are stretched to their limit. In every town, on every corner, young Arabs are attacking Jews – mostly with knives, but also with firebombs and guns – and the violence is liable to escalate.

Again there's a cycle of violence. Again the question: is this the third intifada? Again, there's pressure on the government and army to find new means to suppress the terror attacks. Again, everyone knows those means are just a temporary Band-Aid on a deep, festering wound and not a true solution.

At times like these, it's easy to slip into extremism, whether despair and fantasies of immigrating to the promised city of Berlin, or primal fear, hatred or illusions of panaceas.

Jewish groups express support for Israel

plungen@thecjn.ca

As Israelis continued to be victimized by terrorist attacks on a daily basis, Canadian Jews gathered in synagogues to pray for the wounded while Jewish organizations suggested a number of practical steps that people could take to show support for Israel.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) called on its supporters to "take action against terrorism" by participating in a five-point suite of activities, including voicing their concerns to Canadian political leaders and letting Israeli leaders know they stand in solidarity with the people of Israel.

In Toronto, UJA Federation announced it was expanding a solidarity mission scheduled for Oct. 19 as well as its participation at a Keren Hayesod meeting in Jerusalem this week. UJA Federation also stated it was advancing $120,000 to the Jewish Agency for Israel's Victims of Terror Fund to assist those attacked in Israel as well as their families.

In Montreal, Federation CJA expressed its solidarity "with our brothers and sisters in Israel. We are planning a community-wide town hall meeting the first week of November and are in the process of securing top speakers for a panel on the current situation in Israel."

Late last week, a group of rabbis affiliated with the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus travelled to Ottawa to present representatives of the Palestinian Authority with a letter asking that the Palestinian government cease the incitement that has led to the violence.

The situation in Israel prompted a statement from Defence Minister Jason Kenney, who said: "Canada condemns in the strongest terms possible the recent wave of terror attacks against Israeli civilians that has resulted in a number of tragic deaths and injuries. Our thoughts and prayers are with the families and friends of the victims.

"There can be no justification for these attacks, and we will continue to oppose efforts undermine Israel's legitimacy or right to defend herself in the face of terror."

As the Israeli death toll grew, CIJA urged Canadians take several steps in solidarity with the victims. It suggested Canadians email UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and the PA diplomatic representative in Canada "to condemn Palestinian terrorism and demand action against Palestinian incitement."

It urged people to sign its petition, which calls on the government of Canada to reaffirm its desire for peace by declaring that Canadian financial support for the Palestinian Authority depends on the PA taking certain actions.

Don't let Palestinian terrorism scare you away from Israel

Gil Troy

As what the British newspaper the Independent outrageously calls a "spate of alleged Palestinian stabbings" against, I guess, "alleged" Jewish victims "allegedly" mounts, Israel's real friends must step in. There are four essential ways to support Israel now. First, defend Israel in the media and online. Second, lobby to ensure ongoing governmental friendship for Israel. Third, speak informally about your love of Israel to friends. And fourth, plan that first or return visit to Israel. Don't let evil win. Don't let Palestinian terrorism scare you from Israel – or cloud your Zionist dreams.

There is a worldwide propaganda war against Israel, with essential battlefields in the media, online and in the universities. People should know their basic maps and facts. They should know how often Israel has offered to compromise, how former U.S. president Bill Clinton blamed former PA president Yasser Arafat for the Oslo peace process's derailment in 2001, when the Palestinians turned away from the best chance for peace and returned to the ugliest form of suicide-bombing terrorism.

In my new book The Age of Clinton, I tell a story everyone should know, that in their final White House meeting, when Arafat tried charming the president by calling him a "great man," Clinton shouted: "I am not a great man. I am a failure. And you have made me one." Clinton wanted Arafat to agree to Israel's historic concessions at Camp David in 2000. The aging terrorist, cast by Clinton to be Nelson Mandela, ultimately was Yasser Arafat. That story reflects the broader story of the Palestinian approach to Israeli and American concessions – demanding more, then still rejecting compromise. These and other facts showing Palestinian rejectionism must be publicized.

Love him or hate him domestically, Prime Minister Stephen Harper has been a true friend to Israel. During this campaign, each major party leader professed support for Israel. Canada's friendship with Israel must stay strong, whatever form the next government takes. All Canadian citizens must insist that their representatives support Canada's sister democracy in the Middle East.

While lobbying legislators, don't make Israel your secret affair. Jewish and non-Jewish friends need to hear about your passion, your fears, and your love for Israelis and for Israel. Too often, in this age of slacktivism, we whip fellow Israel supporters into a pro-Israel frenzy by forwarding pro-Israel articles or posts to one another and making ourselves feel good. Virtual support is important, but genuine outreach remains the real thing. Having people transfer their affection for you to the Jewish state, or at least become more respectful and acknowledge complexity during a media pile-on against Israel, is essential.

Finally, remember the equation "2DW = 1IL" – two trips to Disney World equal one trip to Israel. Now is the time to go to Israel, to enjoy, to see that life continues, and by going, to help life continue. The organized Jewish community should encourage Israel tours, absorbing the extra security costs so everyone feels extra protected, even if millions wander the streets of Israel safely every day, without such protection.

And given that for so many people, a trip to Israel might be the budget-busting trip of the decade or a lifetime, and given their justifiable concern that precisely the day they go, the situation might deteriorate, the Jewish community should also create a special travel insurance plan to cover last-minute Israel trip cancellations. If every Jew chipped in $5 or $10, it would more than cover such special insurance, and leave some left over to send some lucky people on a trip via Birthright or any other legitimate, fun and inspiring Israel program.

So stop the hand-wringing and start acting. The time to help Israel has arrived. And the time to enjoy Israel in all its glory and complexity has arrived, too. ■

Between the crosses: memory and forgetting

Sara Horowitz

For Canadians, the Jewish and Gregorian calendars resonate together in early November. The leaves turn and fall, leaving bare branches that point to the dead of winter ahead. Past the flush of Jewish festivals, of zman simchateinu, the time of our joy, is the Hebrew month so devoid of celebration that we call it Mar Cheshvan, bitter Cheshvan. We engage with Holocaust Education Week, as poppies pinned to our lapels mark the sacrifice of fallen soldiers in both great wars. Kristallnacht – or the November Pogrom – is followed immediately by Remembrance Day. It is the season of sober remembrance.

Although the red poppy of remembrance is ubiquitous, it is an odd symbol with contradictory associations – memory and forgetting, death and redemption. The practice of wearing the poppy derives, of course, from the wartime poem In Flanders Fields, composed in 1915 by Maj. John McCrae, a Canadian doctor from Guelph, for the funeral of a fellow soldier.

The poem begins in nature, famously observing, "In Flanders fields the poppies blow." The pitched battle in Flanders so ravaged the soil that little but the hardy poppy could grow. The red poppies proliferating there symbolize both the blood of fallen soldiers and the regeneration of life in a wasteland. They link up with an older Christian use of the poppy as an emblem for the bleeding wounds, death and resurrection of Jesus, and also with the sleep-inducing, memory-erasing death-like properties of opium, sourced from poppies. The poet Paul Celan, a survivor of Auschwitz, evokes these contradictory meanings in the title of his 1952 collections of poems, Mohn und Gedächtnis, or Poppy and Remembrance.

I thought of this odd conflation of memory and forgetting when my husband and I visited the beaches of northern France last June, the week of D-Day. Even on a balmy spring morning, the conditions were harsh, and we imagined the treacherous Normandy landing of the Allied troops in the 1944 invasion, whose staggering losses were a given.

After Juno and Omaha beaches, we visited the Canadian and U.S. military cemeteries. At the U.S. cemetery, we saw seemingly infinite rows of white crosses. The side facing forward, toward the cemetery entrance, was blank. Inscribed on the back of each cross was the name of the dead and a few other details. The uniformity in death mirrored the uniformity of the military uniform when alive. Individuals lost their lives, but in death they were remembered as a unit, defending shared goals, ideals and values. Scattered among the crosses, barely discernible visually, were markers bearing a Magen David, perched upon what served for the other graves as the vertical post of the cross.

In the Canadian cemetery, graves were marked by traditional arc-shaped white gravestones, each inscribed with the name of the soldier and other details. There was a space in which – for most graves – was etched a cross. A small number of gravestones had a Magen David instead, and an even smaller number, simply a blank space.

The American and the Canadian cemeteries based these religious designations on the identity tags of the fallen soldiers. In the American cemetery, the default designation was Christian. Only if a soldier's dog tags explicitly identified him as Jewish would he be buried under a Magen David. Our guide noted that many Jewish soldiers were buried beneath the sign of the cross. Often, soldiers did not indicate their religion on their dog tags, in case of capture by Nazi forces. "In Flanders fields the poppies blow/ Between the crosses, row on row." In the Canadian cemetery, by contrast, when the religion of the fallen soldier was not specified, the space on the gravestone was left blank.

Without conferring, my husband and I began placing small stones on the Jewish graves. In each cemetery, we walked between rows of grave markers, bringing Jewish ritual to the final resting place of known Jewish soldiers, far from the home and family they died defending. ■

The Jewish left's political agenda

Michael Taube

There are moments when I feel this column could be solely used as a vehicle to refute left-wing Jewish criticism of the Tories.

The temptation regularly exists to critique centrist/progressive commentators who claim to understand what Stephen Harper and the Tories are up to. They often present imaginary scenarios to illustrate how the government, in their mind, has conned the community for political and financial support.

During the federal election, some Jews were angered by the political strategies of Tory MPs Mark Adler (some of his campaign posters included the words "son of a Holocaust survivor") and Joyce Bateman (who criticized some Liberal candidates/supporters for their views on Israel during an all-candidates' meeting).

They were furious with Tory candidate Robert Libman, too. It was widely reported that a campaign worker tapped a mezuzah at a constituent's door and said, "OK, but remember who you are."

So, they lashed out.

Andrew Cohen's Sept. 23 Ottawa Citizen column, for instance, claimed Defence Minister Jason Kenney resembled a "minister of the Jews," and remembered a time "when Jews in this country, in their politics, were less parochial."

The author also threw in this little gem for good measure: "No one can say that the Conservatives have not worked for the support they are said to enjoy among most of Canada's 330,000 Jews. It's not just their loyalty to the State of Israel. It's dropping a little gelt here and there, like a cheque from Pierre Poilievre for $120,000 for the Soloway Jewish Community Centre in Ottawa. Its swimming pool's dehumidification system needed repair, surely one of Canada's urgent infrastructure challenges."

In Cohen's view, "many Canadian Jews have become one-issue voters. Whatever alienates two-thirds of Canadians from the government scarcely registers with them. It is about Israel, all the time, and Harper is the Lion of Judah."

Former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Benjamin Shinewald's Oct. 9 Globe and Mail opinion piece followed a similar pattern. He claimed: "Canadian Jews increasingly believe that the Conservatives' policy on Israel was never entirely about Israel. Rather, it was about driving a wedge into their community and cementing those on the Conservative side of the divide into Stephen Harper's political base."

While recognizing "large numbers of Canadian Jews remain resolutely Conservative," he felt the "Tory message is wearing on some." He went on, "And, like all Canadians, Jewish voters are generally motivated by a complex bundle of political imperatives, not just one. Neglected in the past, Jews now wonder if they are being used."

Cohen and Shinewald are entitled to their opinions. Alas, the perceived reality they described is pure fantasy. As I've written before, most Jews aren't single-issue voters. When this community finally dropped the embarrassing charade of acting like a left-wing monolith, many embraced political and economic conservatism. They support important measures such as lower taxes, fiscal prudence, less government interference and strong foreign policy positions. They're comfortable with, and not fearful of, most Tory policies.

Contrary to popular belief, Israel plays a minor, and not a major, role in Jewish Canadian voting patterns. A few candidates aside, it wasn't used as a wedge issue by the Tories, or a "divide and conquer" strategy to tear apart the community. It's a myth to say otherwise, and the political left knows it.

Meanwhile, Jewish voters weren't used as political pawns during the federal election. Most sensible individuals realize this. Sure, there are strategic reasons to use specific language and techniques with ethnic and religious communities. The Tories do this, and so do the Liberals, NDP, Greens and others. That's politics, folks.

The fact that some overly sensitive left-wing Jews can't handle this community's political shift is both unfortunate and predictable. When they start embellishing details or puffing up stories that only represent a fraction of the community, that's bloody offensive. ■

Bound by our history

Bernie Farber

Just prior to World War II, a young man from a small Polish village saw what many others refused to see – the real possibility of a war in which Jews would be targeted by the Nazi regime.

Wanting to live, he took matters into his own hands. Through stealth and luck he managed to make his way to Gdansk, and stowed away on a boat headed to the United States.

Velvel Farber, my father's older brother, made it across the Atlantic. However, like many others before him, he was apprehended upon arrival and was returned to Poland. Velvel was murdered in the gas chambers of Treblinka in 1943.

Canada was no better than the United States prior to the war, turning away frantic refugees who came within miles of our shores. The 1938 story of the MS St. Louis, with its boatload of Jews mostly from Germany is just one harrowing example. Following the Cuban nullification of their transit visas, neither Canada nor the United States welcomed them and they were all returned to Europe where hundreds perished in Nazi death camps.

I come, therefore, to the issue of refugees bound by a history that speaks to callousness of democratic governments, racism and ultimate despair.

Today another refugee crisis, not seen since the ominous days of Velvel Farber and the passengers aboard the MS St Louis, has erupted onto the world's stage.

Canada must respond to the Syrian refugee crisis and move beyond hesitation and fear to help those escaping war in Syria. Like many immigrants before, whom today make up much of Canada's population, people arriving from Syria can make a rich contribution to Canadian society. Although the current government has pledged to match Canadian donations up to $100 million, Canada can do more.

The crisis facing us today is complex with no simple solution. However, it is one that compels a meaningful response. The Mosaic Institute, where I have recently been appointed executive director, is assembling qualified Canadians to help advise on such a response.

> Canada must respond to the Syrian refugee crisis and move beyond hesitation and fear

Canada has had a long history as a promoter of peace around the world. In my work both with the Canadian Jewish community and other communities, I have long believed in the need to engage in respectful dialogue and the vital need for good research on immigration patterns and resultant integration of newcomers to Canada.

The fact that the Mosaic Institute engages in this work was a key factor in my decision to accept the appointment. With the establishment of the "Humanity Wins" committee, chaired by Ron Atkey – former immigration minister in Joe Clark's Conservative government and former chair of Canada's Security, Intelligence and Review Committee – we have begun a process of dialogue and action to articulate a Canadian response to the Syrian refugee crisis. Committee members such as Ed Broadbent, Norman Inkster, Louise Arbour, Hind Kabawat, and Atom Egoyan are just a sampling of those who have signed on to help.

The "Humanity Wins" committee has made three strategic recommendations to the government for consideration:

- Improve access by sending Canadian visa officials to refugee camps.
- Speed up the process by streamlining the forms, rules and regulations to move Syrian refugees here quickly.
- Contribute to a political solution by supporting the development of a sustainable and meaningful political response to the conflict in Syria.

A political solution will require both diplomatic and community-based efforts, both of which require an active role from the Canadian government. This could include convening political leaders in the region, facilitating peace talks, consulting with civil society leaders and with Canadians of Syrian background, and so on.

In memory of the victims of Canada's history of closed borders, the immediate action of beginning the process of refugee resettlement and peace building would speak well to Canada's reputation for leadership in trying times. ■

Political differences among Jews aren't new, observers say

plungen@thecjn.ca

It's funny. On the national stage, Canada's relationship with Israel – and which party is best positioned to maintain it – barely became an issue. In interviews with The CJN in our last issue, each of the party leaders proclaimed their support for Israel, for a negotiated peace agreement with the Palestinians and their opposition to the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

Yet on the campaign trail, in a few select ridings where the Jewish vote might make a difference, candidates traded barbs over which party can best be trusted to have Israel's back. The Conservatives referred to their record of backing the Jewish state when times got tough, and when it wasn't necessarily a popular position to take. Liberal and New Democratic candidates in Mount Royal, Eglinton-Lawrence, York Centre and Thornhill, among other ridings, argued there is barely any daylight between the parties' positions on Israel.

Tory candidates pointed to some Liberal candidates' problematic position on Israel and noted how in the past, the Liberals hadn't always voted for Israel at the UN. Liberal candidates responded that the Tories ought not make Israel "a wedge issue."

Other issues have divided Jewish voters, including refugee policy and whether Muslim women should remove the niqab when taking the oath of citizenship.

At one point in the campaign, a small group of protesters, organized by the Jewish Defence League, gathered outside the Toronto home of Honey and Barry Sherman as they hosted Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau in a fundraiser for the party and for York Centre candidate Michael Levitt. They were protesting what they called the Liberals' dangerous policy on Iran and the fact a prominent Jewish family would host him.

So is there a wedge developing in the Jewish community based on political orientation? Not according to a handful of observers who believe differences over parties' positions on Israel and the Mideast won't have a lasting effect.

The community isn't monolithic – there's no one view on which party to support in any election – so political disagreements won't prevent joint action on a host of other issues, whether it be reacting to events in Israel, tackling poverty or supporting Jewish education, they say.

Shimon Fogel was at the centre of some of the political jockeying during the recently concluded campaign. As CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), he received requests from partisan officials eager for him to endorse their party's record on Israel. But he declined, citing legal constraints on charitable organizations.

Yet political differences in the community are nothing new. "These different perspectives had emerged long before Honey and Barry Sherman decided to host an event for Michael Levitt and the Liberals," he said. "It didn't create cleavages that didn't exist before." What's more, he added, "different perspectives are not inherently a bad thing. The Jewish community benefits from a whole range of different views."

As to suggestions Jewish unity might suffer due to politics, "I reject that assertion absolutely," Fogel said. "CIJA is a big table. We have people representing a wide spectrum of political views. I see nothing but warmth and mutual respect around our table."

The three main party leaders at the Munk Debate on Foreign Policy

Nelson Wiseman is a professor of political science at the University of Toronto and has tracked voting trends among different Canadian groups. After the last election in 2011, Ipsos queried more than 39,000 voters at exit polls and found "the most striking shift was among Jews to the Conservatives."

The data looked at a variety of ethnic and religious groups, and found that while the Tories received nearly 40 per cent of the vote overall, a gain from 36 per cent in the prior election, about 52 per cent of Jews backed the Conservatives, up 20 percentage points from 2008. (Jews comprise about one per cent of Canada's population.) By contrast, only 12 per cent of Muslims voted Conservative, while 46 per cent supported the Liberals and 38 per cent backed the NDP.

Wiseman believes some of the Tories' Jewish support stems from their strong stand vis-a-vis Israel. In the 2011 election, then-Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff alienated some Jews by suggesting Israel committed a war crime in a bombing in Lebanon. (He had also authored a piece in 2002 calling for an imposed solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, enforced by foreign troops.)

Jews moved to the Conservatives in part over differences on the Middle East, but also because their socio-economic situation improved over the years, Wiseman said. For some, the Tories, who had been seen as the party of the Anglo-Saxon establishment, is now more welcoming for Jews, who are themselves much more established.

Differences over the Middle East were not at play to the same extent in the recent campaign. The Liberal and NDP messages of support for Israel drew Jews back to those parties, though not to their historical levels, but enough to perhaps swing a vote in ridings held by Tories, he suggested.

Wiseman noted that at the Munk Debate, the issue of Israel was raised by Conservative Leader Stephen Harper, but Trudeau quickly "shut that door," and the issue wasn't pursued. For most Canadians, it's not a factor at all, and for Jewish Canadians, it was less of a factor than in previous elections.

Issie Lyon, chair of the co-ordinating committee of JSpace, a progressive Zionist group, does see a divide in the Jewish community. "Many feel they have to support Harper because of his strong support for Israel, regardless of his domestic policies and everything else he's done," Lyon said. "There is a sizable portion of the Jewish community that says we have to take into account what he's done domestically and others who say it's not particularly good for Israel because of his blind support." ■

Elections official OKed graphic anti-Israel signs

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jewish groups were disappointed by an official decision that graphic political signs accusing Israel of murder posted around Montreal during the campaign did not violate the Canada Elections Act.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and B'nai Brith Canada separately lodged complaints with Elections Canada. The ruling was made by the Commissioner of Canada Elections, an independent officer whose duty is to ensure that the law governing elections is complied with.

The complaints concern signs with a photo of the mangled, lifeless body of a child on a beach and the text in French: "Israel murders Palestinian children/ Harper applauds/ What do the other parties say?"

They were sponsored by BDS-Québec, a committee of the Coalition pour la Justice et la Paix en Palestine. It was registered as a third party with Elections Canada in August, under the name of Bruce Katz, a longtime leader of the anti-Israel group PAJU (Palestinian and Jewish Unity).

Registered third parties have the right to advertise within certain spending limits and funding regulations. Katz said about 100 of the signs were put up, and many could be seen in the downtown core. BDS-Québec also has a Facebook page illustrated with the sign.

"We are very disappointed by the decision," said CIJA chief executive officer Shimon Koffler Fogel. "We have reviewed the Canada Elections Act carefully and remain convinced that these signs are in violation of Article 91, because they blatantly propagate false information.

"While the review process was clearly thoughtful, we are disturbed that the commissioner failed to recognize the factual misrepresentation and manipulation at the centre of this campaign. If these signs are legitimate, then what isn't?"

Article 91 states that, "The Canada Elections Act does not control the content of election advertising except as follows: it prohibits the publication of false statements about a candidate or prospective candidate, in order to affect election results."

To remove third party signs is a criminal offence. The signs, which began appearing the third week of September, refer to the four Palestinian boys who died in July 2014 while playing soccer on a beach allegedly as a result of an Israeli airstrike on the port of Gaza. BDS-Québec is protesting that Israel closed its investigation after finding no criminal responsibility.

> We are disappointed by the decision.
> Shimon Koffler Fogel
> CIJA CEO

B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn described the signs as not only disturbing, but also anti-Semitic, and strongly condemned their content and tone.

"The fact that this group was allowed to register for official third party status, and continues to be sanctioned by Elections Canada while posting graphic and incendiary materials aimed at a particular ethnic group, demonstrates a fundamental gap in the Canada Elections Act," said Mostyn.

"We will be bringing this issue forward to the incoming government to address this important area for reform. Election campaigns should explore matters of political interest to all Canadians, but should never target minority groups for hateful incitement."

According to its website, BDS-Québec is supported by 27 groups, including such major unions as the Centrale des syndicats du Québec and the Fédération nationale des enseignantes and des enseignants, the Fédération des femmes du Québec, the student union Association syndicale pour une solidarité étudiante (ASSE), Independent Jewish Voices and the political party Québec solidaire.

One of those listed supporters, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), the most active pro-Palestinian campus group, distanced itself from the signs.

Javier Hoyos, an SPHR member and a key campaigner to get a boycott, divestment and sanctions resolution passed last fall by the Concordia Student Union, told the Concordia University student newspaper The Link: "Unfortunately, when people look at that poster, they will automatically assume that SPHR is involved. We are our own independent group. We have nothing to do with BDS-Québec." ■

CAMPAIGN NOTEBOOK

Now it's time to mend fences in the Jewish community

Daniel Wolgelerenter

When we sat down in early summer to discuss how we'd cover what was expected to be a five-week fall campaign, CJN editor Yoni Goldstein asked me to write a weekly column about election topics of Jewish interest. The idea – a departure from past practice of mostly limiting ourselves to rather pedestrian riding profiles – made me a bit nervous.

To echo a current catchphrase, I felt like I was just not ready.

My main concern was finding material to write about, since Jews and Jewish issues had never figured very prominently in a federal election before, even in 2011, when exit polls suggested that for the first time, a majority of Jews had voted Conservative, largely on the strength of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's vocal support for Israel.

But after the longest campaign in modern Canadian history, I can declare that my anxiety was definitely misplaced. Jews and Jewish issues have been more conspicuous in this election than in any campaign in living memory. Jews were news, as they say.

From the many debates and panels held by Jewish groups, shuls and schools across the country, to efforts by the Canadian Jewish Public Affairs Committee urging Jews to volunteer for the party of their choice, dayeinu – it would have been enough.

But there was so much more to write about, much of it centred on Israel and which party could best be counted on to support the Jewish state.

Most notably, there was a nasty dustup over businessman Barry Sherman's decision to host a fundraiser for Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau at his Toronto home. Sherman was pilloried in a widely circulated email by a former magazine publisher, who said Sherman was "betraying the memory of the six million" because of Trudeau's choice of advisers, and his brother's views on Israel and the Iran deal. In an unprecedented move, the Jewish Defence League picketed Sherman's house on the evening of the fundraiser.

Meanwhile, perennially embattled York Centre Tory MP Mark Adler found himself at the centre of a national debate for noting in campaign material and on his website that he's the son of a Holocaust survivor, and for claiming he was the first child of a survivor elected to Parliament (he wasn't, as we were first to report).

And who can forget the social media gaffes by candidates from all parties, many of which were about Israel and Jews? A number were uncovered by the upstart satirical news site True North Times (TNT), run by three young Montreal students, two of whom are Jewish. It showed how a candidate's digital footprint could one day resurface to bite them in the posterior – which might give pause to Jews embroiled in ugly political debates on social media.

Among TNT's finds was NDP candidate Alex Johnstone, a Hamilton school board official who refused to step aside despite admitting to not knowing what Auschwitz was after making a tasteless joke about it on Facebook. Another TNT target who did resign was Winnipeg NDPer Stefan Jonasson. He once compared haredi Jews to the Taliban on social media.

One non-TNT casualty was Calgary Liberal candidate Ala Buzreba, 21, who quit over comments she made as a teenager on Twitter, saying a supporter of Israel should have been aborted with a coat hanger.

Jews also jumped into the fray when Syrian refugees became a major election issue. A group of prominent Jews criticized the position of the governing Tories on the issue, while others came to the Conservatives' defence, and – though not directly tied to the election – synagogues in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal mobilized to sponsor Syrian families to come to Canada.

And when debate pivoted to the related cultural issues of citizenship and the niqab, Jews had strong views on both sides, as reflected in our pages last week.

This column was written before local and national election results were known, but what can be said with some certainty is that this was arguably the most divisive federal election in Canadian history for the Jewish community.

In the aftermath, there are fences to be mended and a measure of unity to be reclaimed. It makes one hope that Jews and Jewish issues can return to being relative bit players the next time around. ■

Sukkot victims of terror recalled at memorial event

plungen@thecjn.ca

Eitam Henkin was a rabbi, a historian and an author of halachic works, so it was perhaps appropriate that a shiur (lesson) looking at his writings would be an appropriate way to memorialize him.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner delivered the shiur, citing Rabbi Henkin's work along with rabbinic commentary on the mitzvah of living in the Holy Land.

The shiur was part of "an evening of remembrance" for Rabbi Henkin, his wife, Naama Henkin, Rabbi Nehemia Lavi and Aharon Banita, who were killed during Sukkot and were among the earliest victims of the recent wave of terror attacks in Israel. The memorial was held Oct. 14 at Yeshivat Or Chaim.

Rabbi Henkin was the son of Rabbi Yehuda Henkin and Rabbanit Chana Henkin, who founded Nishmat in Jerusalem as a school to provide Torah learning to women. Rabbi Henkin and Naama Henkin were driving in a car when Palestinian gunmen opened fire, killing them. Their four children, including a four-month old infant, were in the back seat, but were unharmed. Police believe one of the attackers was accidentally shot by his colleagues, prompting them to end the attack.

Rabbi Lavi was killed in the Old City of Jerusalem when he came to the aid of Aharon Banita (Bennett), who was being attacked along with his wife, their two-year-old son and infant daughter by a knife-wielding Palestinian. The Banita family were on their way to pray at the Western Wall. Banita's wife, Adele, was seriously wounded in the attack, while their two-year-old son was lightly wounded and the infant was unharmed.

Rabbi Torczyner said that although he did not know Rabbi Henkin personally, scanning his website revealed a scholar of broad interests on a wide range of Torah-related subjects. "What emerges is an active and inquisitive mind... suspicious of jingoism and the party line," he said.

Among the late rabbi's prolific writings was an examination of the mitzvah of living in Israel. Rabbi Henkin lived with the people of Israel, recognized the differences among them yet felt Jews should embrace one another. He revelled in the unity of the nation on Tu b'Av. Rabbi Torczyner concluded by noting the importance to Rabbi Henkin of the unity of Am Yisrael (the nation of Israel).

Earlier, eulogies for the four victims were read, including one for Rabbi Henkin delivered at his funeral in Jerusalem by his brother, Yagil Henkin.

"Eitam and Naama were not killed by 'terror,'" Yagil stated. "They are victims of an act of hostility. It was hostility behind the murder. Human beings driven by hatred went out to the road in order to murder Jews, and they succeeded. They took my brother from me and from my siblings; from Yishai they took his sister Naama; from my parents and from Naama's parents they took their children; from the children – Matan, Nitzan, Neta and Itamar – they took their parents, they took the right to grow up in a family, with the experiences and memories of a warm, unified and loving family. They took from you, who stand here, a talented and optimistic couple, who were destined to greatness. And they continue to take from everyone the sense of security. They were Arab murderers, backed by a too-large segment of Arab society, with far too little principled opposition to murder. An enemy. An enemy who utilizes terror.

"Do not degrade their memory by turning them into victims of a force of nature. Debate about policy, not about the murdered. Do not find justification and sympathy for murderers. Keep your empathy for the children who were left orphans, to the parents who were left bereft. And for the people of Israel, who still have a long way before being able to sit peacefully beneath their vines and fig trees." ■

Eitz Chaim preschool opens under provisional license

sshefa@thecjn.ca

After new provincial child-care regulations forced Eitz Chaim Schools to postpone the start of the school year for its nursery and preschool programs, the school reopened just before the Sukkot holiday and is operating under a provisional license.

At the start of the school year, many parents were left scrambling to find child care for their children after many Jewish daycares, preschool and nursery programs that weren't in compliance with the new rules were forced to shut down, either temporarily or permanently.

The Child Care and Early Years Act replaced the Day Nurseries Act in August and applies to unlicensed child care, home child-care providers contracted by a licensed agency, licensed home child-care agencies, and licensed child-care centres.

Some of the new rules dictate that a provider can only care for a maximum of two children under the age of two; that a licensed home child-care provider can care for a maximum of six children under the age of 13; and that the maximum number of children applies regardless of the number of adults in the home.

Eitz Chaim was one of the schools affected by the new legislation, forcing it to temporarily shut down its nursery and pre-nursery programs, but it has since been granted a temporary license while administrators work to meet the requirements on issues such as zoning, fire code, health code, building code, insurance and specific operating policies.

In a letter than went out in September to parents of children enrolled at Eitz Chaim, administrators explained that although they were aware of the new regulations that would come into effect for the 2015-16 school year, the school's legal counsel advised them that the Ministry of Education would likely allow the preschool to operate with an extension while they sorted things out with the province.

Administrators hoped Eitz Chaim's preschools would be allowed to operate as religious, cultural and linguistic instruction programs, which they thought would exempt them from the license requirement, but that was not the case.

Carly Haber, a mother of twin two-year-old boys enrolled at Eitz Chaim, said she suspects the confusion and postponement of the nursery and pre-school programs was the result of "bad legal advice."

New rules no longer grandfather private schools.

"My older son's school was totally ahead of the game. We found out about the ministry guidelines last year. They said they'd be making all these changes. I should have thought to check with Eitz Chaim, but the truth is they said they were told they got legal advice that they qualified for a religious exemption, but there's no reason they would have gotten a religious exemption. They're a school," Haber said.

Gary Wheeler, a spokesperson from the Ministry of Education, explained that "schools serving children under the age of 3.8 years that were previously exempted from licensing requirements were given over a year to prepare, and were notified in writing as early as March 6, 2014."

He said the ministry extended the deadline for the licensing requirement to be met by grandfathered private schools by six months, from July 1, 2015, to January 1, 2016, but schools would have had to apply for that by January 2015, in order to operate while the application process was ongoing.

"There was also follow-up with schools who missed that deadline, including multiple phone calls, correspondence and on-site visits," Wheeler said.

Requests for comment from Eitz Chaim were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Gan Sameach preschool, which operated out of the Shomrei Shabbos Chevrah Mishnayos Congregation in Toronto, and served about 40 children, was another school that was not licensed when the new regulations came into effect. It remains closed indefinitely.

"My neighbour was sending their kids to Gan Sameach," Haber said.

"She was stuck, but now her daughter is with a babysitter," she said, adding that some mothers offered to help.

"Some people just felt that they could have a playgroup in their house. They said, 'I have one of my kids at home and I could take two more kids and make some money.'" ■

Teens learn real-world philanthropy on charitable board

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Thirty Jewish teens will spend the next seven months making real-world financial decisions together, with the direct impact reflected in the Toronto Jewish community.

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, in collaboration with WOW!, an initiative of UJA Federation's Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education and the Jewish Teen Funders Network, launched a new project this month called the Jewish Teen Board.

Funding will also come from Laura Lauder and the Maimonides Fund.

The venture will see a group of high school students from around the city forming a volunteer philanthropy board and going through an actual granting process involving organizations in the community.

Program co-ordinator Aron Katz said the board is the first program of its kind in the Toronto Jewish community, but it's launching alongside similar programs being run in Boston and Melbourne, Australia, a year after the San Diego Jewish Community Foundation and the Jewish Fund in Detroit created teen boards of their own.

The purpose, Katz explained, is to "grow supplementary Jewish education and engagement" by encouraging giving and creating social change through a Jewish lens.

It will further give the teenage participants, who range from grades 9 to 11, the chance to fulfil their quota of school-mandated community service hours in a way that's educational and meaningful.

The 30 students who comprise the board were selected Oct. 7, following an application process involving interviews and, for some of the applicants, a nomination from someone in a leadership position within the community.

Katz said the response was overwhelming and that the program attracted students from Jewish high schools in Toronto, as well as students from public schools in other GTA municipalities such as Newmarket and Oakville who may have had less exposure to Jewish communal life.

"We looked for people who want to make a difference in the community and enhance their leadership abilities," he said.

From the end of October to June, the teens will meet once a month at the Lipa Green Centre and operate in the same way a charitable or family foundation does: they'll learn about the needs facing the Jewish community and create a mission statement after choosing to focus on one area, such as senior citizens, the Holocaust survivor community, health or food security.

Aron Katz

From there, they'll work to forge connections with the different charities and agencies that provide services in line with their mandate. They'll then put out a request for grant proposals to different charitable organizations and agencies, who will submit grant applications to the board.

Lastly, the board will undergo a review process and at the program's culmination, hold a ceremony to present cheques to the organizations they've chosen to support and summarize all the work they've done.

Katz said the Jewish Foundation doesn't yet know how much money funders will give the board for grants. He also said he's not sure how many groups the board will give grants to, since that it will depend on the need they choose to support.

The grant money will come primarily from the board's funders, but the students themselves will also do some fundraising. Katz said that will help them get a taste of what it's like to engage potential donors and ultimately "close the deal."

With an educational background in marketing and communications, Katz said he'll be training the teens in strategic philanthropy and fundraising skills, but that partners of the Jewish Foundation and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will also provide mentorship and networking opportunities.

Katz said the program gives teens an insider view of how charities work.

"A lot of these teenagers have volunteered in places like soup kitchens or seniors homes. But this program shows them... the nature of why these types of organizations exist and allows them to them make a difference from the root. It lets them see a program on paper that doesn't yet exist and make decisions to fund something they'll later see in action." ■

WINS FIRST PRIZE AT iGEM COMPETITION

Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev is thrilled to announce that a team of students from the University has won First Place in the Health and Medicine category and PLACED SECOND OVERALL in the iGEM (International Genetically Engineered Machine) Competition, which welcomed 259 teams of 4,600 students to MIT last September.

This team, comprised of eight students from a variety of fields, is the first Israeli group to have reached this level of achievement at the twelve-year-old competition. Congratulations to Prof. Smadar Cohen, Dr. Emil Robinov, and Dr. Efrat Forti of BGU's biotechnology engineering department, for their outstanding direction.

The BGU team's project, called Boomerang, involves an engineered genetic device which disrupts genes essential for cancer survival, and activates suicide genes for cancer cell detection and complete surgical removal. The Boomerang system can be designed according to unique characteristics of a patient's tumor, paving the way to personalized medicine.

CABGU is extremely grateful to Montreal's Lederman Foundation, which made the team's participation possible.

Canadian olim root for Jays in the Holy Land

DANIEL KOREN
dkoren@thecjn.ca

The Segal children

In Modi'in, an affluent community 35 km southeast of Tel Aviv and 30 km west of Jerusalem, a car is parked on the side of a busy road, a blue flag protruding from a rear window.

It's not the flag of Israel, however. It's a Toronto Blue Jays banner.

With an estimated population of more than 75,000, Modi'in has a large contingent of Canadian, American and other English-speaking olim who have settled there.

One such family includes Toronto-born Ernest Segal, his Montrealer wife, and their four children. According to Segal, 45, the family is mixed when it comes to certain sports teams – his wife and one of his sons are Montreal Canadiens fans for example – but they're all in agreement when it comes to the Blue Jays.

"We are a family of Blue Jays fans," Segal said by phone from Israel. "This summer, we came back to Toronto, so I made sure we went to a bunch of games."

Thanks to MLB TV, which you can livestream via the Internet, being a Jays fan in Israel is easier than you'd think. And with the playoffs, Canadian olim have also "#ComeTOgether," to use the slogan and hashtag associated with the Jays' playoff run, despite being 9,263 km away.

For Game 1 of the Blue Jays-Rangers American League Division Series (ALDS), Segal hosted a party for his family and other Torontonians in the area to watch the game. The seven-hour time difference wasn't even that much of a problem, with the game starting at 3:37 p.m. EST.

"We had barbecue, drank beers, and watched the game. Though they lost, word still got around the community, and we're expecting even more people for our Game 2 barbecue against Kansas," Segal told The CJN ahead of the Oct. 17 American League Championship Series (ALCS) matchup.

Due to the time difference, living in Israel actually makes it easier for religious Jews to watch Saturday games.

"I'm shomer Shabbat so in Toronto I can't watch games that start at 1 p.m. or 4 p.m.," explained Meir Balofsky, a fellow Toronto expat who lives in Ramat Gan. "But here I can."

Which meant he didn't have to miss Game 2 of the ALCS, and thanks to social media, "it feels like you're cheering along with friends and family from all over the world," he added.

An avid sports fan, Balofsky said the Blue Jays were his "first true sports love." In fact, despite his living in Israel since 2004, he's attended at least one game per season since 1979.

While baseball is not yet mainstream in Israel, it is becoming more popular, particularly in Modi'in, which had a team in the Israel Baseball League, a six-squad pro circuit that played for one season in 2007.

"There's a family from Texas here, and there's been a lot of trash talking in shul," Segal says. "There's a family from Kansas, too, so that has definitely continued."

As for the Blue Jays flag on Segal's car, while most Israelis don't recognize it, a woman did honk at his wife while she was driving. "I haven't seen that in 20 years, since I lived in Toronto!" she told her.

Coincidentally, after the Jays' historic Game 5 win on Oct. 14, Balofsky walked into a store in Givatayim wearing a Blue Jays hat and the store owner yelled at him, "Did you see the game?!"

"He went off about Jose Bautista and his home run, and was clearly not North American by any stretch," he said.

Twenty-four-year-old Leor Mann, who made aliyah from Toronto in 2013 and joined the IDF a year later, said the first thing he did when he moved to Israel was purchase MLB TV and the MLB at Bat app. "There is no Sportsnet or TSN here, and the only sports shown on TV are soccer and basketball," he said.

Mann said that he "prays" for afternoon games. "I watched every game of the Texas series, though I did fall asleep during Game 3, which started at 3 a.m. here."

Having been born in 1991, Mann has "no memory" of the Jays' back-to-back World Series championships in 1992 and 1993.

"My father was at the game when Joe Carter 'touched them all' [in 1993] and has had a huge influence on my love of the game. In extraordinary fashion, Bautista has supplied my generation's Joe Carter moment. I can only hope this continues to the World Series."

Amen. ■

New resource guide for people with special needs

The original members of the Toronto Jewish Disabilities Network at their first meeting in 2011

sshefa@thecjn.ca

It was a project two years in the making, but now people with disabilities and their families have access to a comprehensive resource guide that provides information about the Jewish organizations in Toronto and elsewhere that offer relevant services.

Susie Sokol, the director and co-founder of Dani (Developing Nurturing and Independence) – a parent-driven organization that serves individuals with disabilities as well as their families and caregivers, and helps people with physical and/or cognitive challenges integrate into the community – said The Toronto Jewish Disability Resource Guide is the first of its kind in our area.

"This is the first one in Toronto. And in many other cities, I don't think there is one to this extent," Sokol said.

The 140-page resource guide for people with disabilities and their families lists resources that cater to their needs both locally and abroad.

In addition to a list of camps, schools, synagogues and other organizations that work to accommodate children and adults with disabilities, the resource guide also provides a list of articles, links and other resources in Canada, the United States, England, Israel and South Africa, that help to inform members of the Jewish community about ways to foster a more inclusive society.

She explained that about four years ago, she initiated a partnership with a number of Toronto-based organizations that work with adults and children with special needs, including Reena, Jewish Family & Child, Friendship Circle and Zareinu Educational Centre.

The idea behind the Toronto Jewish Disability Network, which includes UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Itanu Toronto, was to address some of the frustrations parents who have children with special needs feel when trying to find services and support to help their children lead productive lives.

"A few years ago, we started the Toronto Jewish Disability Network... We got together and decided that we would form a group and also look at what is missing in Toronto, seeing what is duplicated, making sure there are enough services for everyone of all ages. For example, make sure there is a Purim party for older kids, for adults, and that everyone is invited and everyone knows about it," Sokol said.

"We thought we'd put out a resource guide. This was our first project – to put together articles, links, information about which shuls are wheelchair accessible, what community organizations will accept adults and how they will support them."

She said about two years ago, the network members started working on the guide, and it took them about a year and a half to collect all the information, find someone to underwrite the project, and produce it.

"We wanted the guide to be free for families. We did not want parents to pay for it."

On Oct. 11, a book launch for the resource guide attracted about 100 people who gathered to celebrate.

"Parents can come to Dani to pick up a copy for their synagogue, for themselves, for their organization, for anybody," Sokol said.

"I've had incredible feedback. They've said, 'This is perfect, this is what we've needed.' There is lots of good information for families to navigate the system. It is information for doctors. I got a call from a doctor who has been practising for 30 years, and he said, 'I had my first patient with autism. Where can I direct him?' Rabbis and educators can also see what's out there."

She said a new website dedicated to the resource guide is currently under construction. "It will be a one-stop shop for families, professionals – everyone can look at this website and see what's available, see who is coming to town to speak, update the resource guide and... see what's happening." ■

Fundraiser to support young women with breast cancer

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

PYNK: Breast Cancer Program for Young Women was the first organization in Canada to offer a comprehensive package of optimal care, support and cutting edge research specifically for women 40 and under with breast cancer.

"Young women diagnosed with breast cancer face challenges that women of other age groups do not face," says Alexandra Landsberg, a survivor of breast cancer when she was 27.

PYNK and Na'amat Canada Toronto have formed a partnership to raise money at a Cabaret For Caring on Oct. 25, at 7 p.m at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Na'amat supports women and children in many areas of daily life in Canada and Israel including education and counselling in a unique community centre in northern Israel. It offers treatment and educational opportunities to at risk children and teens, as well as shelters for vulnerable women and children who are victims of abuse. Na'amat touches approximately 40,000 lives each year, notes Lori Nusbaum, senior fundraising and development officer at Na'amat.

Both organizations are supported entirely by private donations.

The evening will pay tribute to the memory of two women, Rickey Fitzerman, the founding member and driving force behind PYNK, and Rivka Shaffir, a past national president of Na'amat Canada, whose passion for educating and counselling women in Canada and Israel has made a difference in many lives.

"It is just under 20 years since my breast cancer diagnosis, says Landsberg, a co-chair of the event, "and I am therefore proudly co-chairing this event in memory of my friend Rickey Fitzerman." Na'amat co-chairs are Doris Wexler-Charow and Celina Fenster.

Dr. Ellen Warner, a medical oncologist at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre introduced Landsberg to Fitzerman in 2007. Fitzerman was the motivation for starting PYNK and inspired a group of young breast cancer survivors to fundraise to establish the organization.

Since 1993, Warner has been a staff medical oncologist at the Sunnybrook Odette Cancer Centre. She is a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto and director of PYNK.

Dr. Ellen Warner

The PYNK program began in 2008. To date, 250 young women aged 17 to 40, their partners and their families have benefited from PYNK's services, Warner says. The young women receive a continuum of care from the time of diagnosis through treatment and long-term follow-up.

"Women diagnosed with breast cancer before age 40 generally have more aggressive disease and more treatment side effects than older women," Warner says.

She says that patients are fast tracked to the right specialists. The nurse navigates them through the maze of tests and treatments and continues to support them and their family as long as necessary after active treatment has ended.

"Even years after treatment is complete, young women have greater physical and psychological distress than older women, due to issues such as breast loss or deformity, infertility, premature menopause, sexual dysfunction and fear of recurrence before their children have grown up."

Cabaret For Caring will feature Aelita: The Queen of Cabaret, big band music, singing, dancing, a wine bar and desserts. ■

Toronto philanthropist inspires Jewish women in Ottawa

DIANE KOVEN

Prominent Toronto activist, philanthropist and Jewish community volunteer Julia Koschitzky was the keynote speaker at this year's annual Choices event, held by the Jewish Federation Ottawa's Women's Campaign.

Koschitzky's message of the importance and value of being involved resonated with the 275 women (and two men) present at the Oct. 8 event, held at Agudath Israel Congregation.

Koschitzky shared her own life story, which began in Wales, where her German Jewish parents had settled after escaping from Germany. Ten years later, the family immigrated to Canada, living in Toronto, where she later met her husband, Henry.

She spoke of the various choices she has made over the years, including the decision to accept a volunteer position that led to more and more volunteer experiences, leadership roles and ultimately the Order of Canada this past summer.

"I was nurtured and inspired to assume many roles," she said of those who mentored her along the way.

Speaking of recent events in Europe, where so many Syrian refugees are seeking new homes and lives, Koschitzky reminisced about her involvement in the rescue and resettlement of Soviet Jewry many years ago.

Seeing pictures of the Syrians trying to board trains in Budapest "stands as a stark contrast to when I stood at the same train station in Budapest in the early 1990s to welcome Soviet immigrants," she said.

"I felt that I was witnessing the Exodus from the Bible... Israel welcomed them all with open arms and unconditional love – how markedly different from the refugees arriving in Europe today."

Koschitzky acknowledged the many dedicated volunteers in the Ottawa Jewish community and listed a number of projects the community has undertaken to help Israel. "At the heart of all these efforts is the knowledge and realization that without solidarity with Israel, there can be no continuity," she said.

Over the past 30 years, Koschitzky's volunteer work has taken her to 52 communities on five continents. She said she feels privileged to have been able to do the work she has done and encouraged the audience members to become involved in their community as well.

"Let us be inspired to learn more, to do more, but most of all to be more," she urged.

"I believe that women are change-makers and community-shapers of the world."

The Choices event, chaired this year by Shari Silber, is an annual dinner that seeks to involve women in the Jewish community and encourage first-time donors to the federation's annual campaign.

This year's event included 60 women who attended for the first time, as well as nine students from Grade 8 at the Ottawa Jewish Community School, who were invited with the aim of inspiring the next generation. ■

50 שנה לקרן לירושלים
THE JERUSALEM FOUNDATION 50TH ANNIVERSARY
السنة الخمسون لمؤسسة صندوق القدس

Dear Friends,

At this difficult time for Jerusalem, our hearts go out to the families of those killed and we pray for the wounded. With the unceasing support of people in Israel and around the world who care deeply for Jerusalem, the Jerusalem Foundation continues our mission on behalf of the city and its residents

Now, more than ever, we must diligently support the people of our beloved city and take every step to preserve and enrich day-to-day life in its communities. We firmly believe that community empowerment and solidarity will help us navigate through the current reality and this is our mission.

Over almost 50 years, the Jerusalem Foundation founded and supported the communal, cultural and educational networks in Jerusalem, developing the neighborhoods and communities of Jerusalem and the resilience of the people of this great city. Now in this moment of trial, Jerusalemites are showing restraint, courage and hope. Always also hope.

Please join forces with the Jerusalem Foundation in order to achieve our common goals, of strengthening and supporting the people of Jerusalem. We will provide counseling and support services to those most in need: the children, youth and young families of Jerusalem, the elderly living on their own, the special needs populations of the city. Living with this kind of stress and fear can have a serious impact on the social fabric of the city. The Jerusalem Foundation is working hand in hand with the municipality and our many partners, particularly at this time of crisis, to show Jerusalemites that they are not alone.

We pray for quieter days, days of peace.

Halifax synagogue celebrates 125 years

Beth Israel Synagogue was founded in 1890 by the Baron de Hirsch Hebrew Benevolent Society.

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

The Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax is ready to celebrate.

From Oct. 23 to 25, the membership will commemorate 125 years of Jewish life in Halifax during a gala Friday night Shabbat dinner, a Saturday kiddush to honor four outstanding volunteers and a cantorial concert Sunday evening, bringing together three men for whom Halifax has great meaning.

It was 125 years ago, in 1890, when the Beth Israel's founding body, the Baron de Hirsch Hebrew Benevolent Society, was formed by a small number of Jews in the Nova Scotia capital. By 1894, it had its own synagogue, a revamped church, which stood until it was levelled by the Halifax Explosion in 1917.

Three years later, a new synagogue was built that lasted until 1957, when growing numbers determined a larger, more modern building was needed. The south-end Halifax shul, whose building is now 58 years old, remains active today.

Membership through the first half of the 20th century mushroomed from 118 in 1901 to 1,089 (more than 225 member families) in 1961. Today, there are less than 100 member families, but the Orthodox shul continues to be the only one east of Montreal with daily minyans and active programs.

President Steven Zatzman, a Halifax lawyer, says that "our community has changed over time, and dramatic changes are continuing to challenge our congregation yet our legacy to future generations is the enrichment the whole Halifax Jewish community receives from the services and facilities we provide."

Chief gabbai Irwin Mendleson, one of those being honoured at the Shabbat kiddush, struggles to assemble 10 men for daily morning minyan. He says, however, "I've seen the importance of keeping our traditions going. I see how members, and the many visitors who come to our doors, need a minyan to say Kaddish and how rewarding it is for us to be there for them."

> I've seen the importance of keeping our traditions going

When he's forced to miss a daily service, the still-practising optometrist says, "I feel guilty if I'm not there, as though I'm letting someone down."

He laughs. "Thank goodness some of the wives kick their husbands before 7:30 in the morning for services."

The Three Cantors Concert will bring together three men with Halifax roots.

Mo Glazman, Halifax-raised and educated, is now senior cantor at New York's Central Synagogue. Tibor Kovari, chazzan and music director at Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue, had his first cantorial and teaching experience in Canada at the Beth Israel in Halifax.

Ede Berkovits, a Montrealer, did post-graduate music work at Dalhousie University in Halifax and part-time cantorial duties at Beth Israel. He met and married his wife in Halifax and recently returned to be cantor on holidays and special occasions.

Despite dwindling membership, common to many shuls across Canada and particularly in smaller communities, Zatzman declares, "Our responsibility is to strive for openness and inclusivity, recognition and acceptance of differences in the needs, desires and diversity within our Jewish community so we may strengthen the Baron de Hirsch Hebrew Benevolent Society as it enters the future with renewed vigour." ■

Israel must make concessions now for peace: Rabin's son

Even amid the current violence, Israel must take the lead in restarting the peace process by engaging not only the Palestinians, but also Arab countries within the region, the son of the slain Yitzhak Rabin said.

"Peace has to be negotiated with our enemies," Yuval Rabin said. If Israel does not deal with Hamas now, it will soon have Islamic State on its border.

Rabin was the guest speaker Oct. 14 at a Montreal event to mark the approaching 20th anniversary of the Israeli prime minister's assassination, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now and the Labor Zionist Circle, in co-operation with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Rabin, a high-tech businessman, is chair and co-founder of the Israel Peace Initiative (IPI), which in 2011 released an alternative proposal for achieving a two-state solution. As the name suggests, IPI believes Israel should once again take the lead in securing its future and not just react to external threats, which Rabin believes is the case now.

He said Israel must be prepared to concede the West Bank and the Arab sections of Jerusalem, as well as lift the blockade on Gaza and give up claim to the Temple Mount, if it is to have lasting peace, and survive as a Jewish state.

Rabin warned that Jews are no longer the majority from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan Valley, and Arabs today account for 40 per cent of Jerusalem's population. Moreover, those residents' allegiance is rapidly shifting toward Hamas, he said.

Gaza, currently ruled by Hamas and densely populated by 1.5 million people, is a "time bomb" that must be defused now, he said.

If peace talks do not resume, the so-called one-state solution will soon be a reality, he said.

Potential partners for Israel in the regional framework include Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinians.

These jurisdictions, like Israel, all fear Islamic extremism and Iran's power. Together, they could co-ordinate their defence against this threat, he said.

A regional rather than a bilateral approach also offers Israel the guarantee that the Palestinians will abide by their concessions, such as on Jerusalem and the right of return.

A multilateral peace agreement would be an economic boon to Israel, Rabin argued. He believes in the decade following this, the country would have another $100 billion not only for secu[illegible]t for social, environmental, technology and law enforcement spending.

To date, he said, the Israeli government has ignored the proposal by IPI, which Rabin said has 700 members representing various political leanings.

Polls indicate that 65 to 70 per cent of Israelis support the plan, and Rabin said his discussions with many Arabs indicate similar openness.

Rabin, who spoke to a capacity audience at the Gelber Conference Centre, characterized his father's murder as a "cold-blooded, calculated act" committed by an ultra-nationalist, anti-democratic religious extremist in a time of bitter division and unchecked incendiary rhetoric.

He resents those in Israel who contend Rabin brought it on himself because of the wave of unprecedented Palestinian terror, including suicide bombings and opposition to the settlements.

As for whether the Oslo accords were a failure, as many allege, Rabin noted that since the last agreement was signed in 1995, the PLO and its successor, the Palestinian Authority, have not perpetrated any violence against Israelis.

"Oslo was the last meaningful progress... All subsequent rounds have failed," he said.

Rabin, who was critical of the Netanyahu government's lack of leadership, said none of the issues that split Israelis apart before the assassination have gone away, and the arguments on both sides remain the same and equally ineffective.

Those religious and political figures he believes were responsible for the "incitement" that led to the assassination are still unrestrained, and some hold positions of power today.

Public discourse is as overwrought among Jewish Israelis as it was in the period before the assassination, he added.

During the question period, Rabin said he is concerned that North American Jews feel compelled to support the right wing. "Israel is the enterprise of the Jewish People... Every Jew should be part of what goes on there." ■

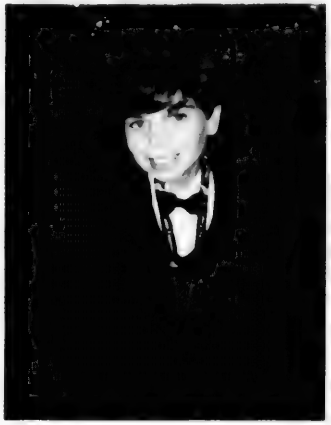
9-year-old CEO is raising funds to help fix kids' hearts

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Joshua Belzowski, left, at the David Foster Foundation Gala, where he pledged to raise $10,000 from his lemonade stand to sponsor a family going through a child's organ and heart transplant, and at right with sister Amanda in 2007.

The 17th annual Amanda's Lemonade Stand fundraiser will take place Oct. 25 at 33 Post Rd. from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., but this year, it features a new twist: it's been fully "Joshified."

Nine-year-old Joshua Belzowski, CEO of Amanda's Lemonade Stand, has taken over planning for the event to raise funds to fix kids' hearts, but he's also raising awareness about the importance of getting involved in helping others.

"At the recent David Foster Foundation Gala, my brother Joshua proudly stood up in front of 1,000 people and personally pledged to raise an additional $10,000 more at this year's lemonade stand fundraiser, specifically to sponsor a family going through a child's organ and heart transplant," said older sister Amanda, founder of Amanda's Lemonade Stand.

Amanda was only two years old when her family held its first lemonade stand. To date, she and her family have raised more than $200,000 for the Heart & Stroke Foundation, Save A Child's Heart, and the Hospital for Sick Children.

Said Mike Ravenhill, CEO of the David Foster Foundation, which supports families of kids who need organ transplants and is a first-time beneficiary this year: "The David Foster Foundation is thrilled and honoured that through the annual Amanda's Lemonade Stand, they have graciously included our foundation as one of the beneficiaries. At the end of the day our families and children 'win the day' as 100 per cent of the donations received through this event to the foundation will go to support families and children across Canada, going through the life-saving organ transplant process."

Giving from the heart is what Josh and Amanda's mother, Lisa Fruitman-Belzowski, learned from her late father, Lou Fruitman, and what her children learned from their zaide.

Fruitman-Belzowski explained to The CJN how it all began.

"I was on the very first [Becel Heart and Stroke] Ride for Heart. I carried on in that vein with my husband and daughter Amanda, who was just shy of two years old [when she first attended], riding in the back carrier of my bike. I explained to her why there were so many people on the ride. I put her hand on her heart – because you can 'feel' that – and I said, all of these people are fixing the heart, because for some people it doesn't sound like that – it makes a different thump," Fruitman-Belzowski said.

"On the way home from the ride, we stopped for lemonade where two young girls had set up a lemonade stand. It inspired us, so we set up our own lemonade stand on our front lawn a week later. All week, Amanda was putting her hand on her heart and telling everyone what she had learned," she added.

"Amanda raised $500 that first year and knew she had done something good. She understood she helped fix hearts the way only a small child can. It really is as simple as that. Kids can do these things and they understand. That's what makes it magical."

Now a first-year student away at university, Amanda eventually decided to hand over the event to Joshua, who has been by her side since he was born, and has followed closely in her footsteps.

"I have been CEO since I was five years old. Amanda really needed a helper. I was in charge of the cookie counter, pouring the lemonade and talking to everybody," said Josh with a smile.

Amanda will be at the fundraising event to help mentor, but this is the first year Josh will be doing all the planning.

"Josh drew a picture when he was three years old of a heart flower. It actually represented an organ transplant, and now Joshua is going to teach people about the importance of registering to be an organ donor and help raise funds and awareness as well," Amanda said.

All of the proceeds will help fix kids' hearts locally and worldwide through SickKids Hospital, Save a Child's Heart and through research sponsored by the Heart and Stroke Foundation. As well, it will go toward promoting organ donation. This year, in addition to the David Foster Foundation, Joshua has added Canadian Blood Services and Trillium Gift of Life Network, to help promote becoming an organ donor, as beneficiaries.

"Our motto: you are never too little to make a big difference. If we can raise $200,000 on a front lawn, then anything is possible," said Joshua with pride.

The event will have food, kids activities, music, live auction and plenty of free lemonade, sugar-free lemonade and cookies for all. ■

Human trafficking is happening in Canada, journalist says

W5's Victor Malarek tells NCJW event it's a myth that women choose prostitution

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

People think human trafficking is something that only happens "over there," in Third World countries, but it happens right here in Canada, journalist and author Victor Malarek told a packed room of more than 100 people at the National Council of Jewish Women's (NCJW) Toronto headquarters Oct. 8.

The NCJW organized the event so members and people from the community at large could learn about the global sex trade. Malarek, a senior investigative reporter for CTV's W5 and a former police reporter in Montreal, is the author of several books exploring the phenomenon.

Malarek gave an impassioned speech about what he called "the global sex trade calamity," explaining that the focus must be turned on the men who purchase sex, rather than the women who sell it, the large majority of whom Malarek insisted aren't choosing to be in the profession, but are either coerced or too desperate to feel they have another option.

He emphasized that those who buy sex are responsible for fuelling the international human trafficking industry, which sees millions of women and girls bought and sold domestically and abroad in countries spanning the globe.

He argued that people imagine the typical john to be "a creepy lounger in a basement hyped up on porn," but that his research has shown him that men who buy sex are ordinary men from all backgrounds and walks of life.

"They're husbands and fathers, CEOs, lawyers, politicians, judges, actors, athletes... even men of the cloth, like rabbis and priests," he said, adding, "Little will be done to stop the worldwide sexual carnage until men generally take responsibility for the men who feel they have the right to buy sex... Men want to believe prostitution is the world's oldest profession, but it's actually the world's oldest oppression."

Victor Malarek

> This business will always be organized by criminals and pimps. Even if you legalize prostitution, you're just giving [these criminals] a legal table to do what they do.

He said the johns often buy into myths about women choosing to sell themselves, seeking to ease their consciences about purchasing sex.

Malarek laid out a number of realities that he said counter this and other myths johns may subscribe to. They include:

- Most women and girls are forced into prostitution.
- Most women are recruited into the sex trade as young as 12 or 13, even in western countries.
- Most girls who are recruited are the victims of broken families and sexual abuse by family members.
- The vast majority of prostituted women are controlled by criminal gangs.
- Many are addicted to drugs.
- Many suffer serious mental health issues.

Malarek said myths about women choosing prostitution has led to a global situation that sees tens of millions of women and girls selling themselves, and the problem is only getting worse.

"Over the past few decades, the demand for purchased sex has gone off the charts," he said, attributing the rise to factors such as poverty, government corruption, lack of education, the "hardcore porn industry" and people in countries across the world, including Canada, who are pushing to legalize prostitution.

The pervasive problem of prostitution can be challenged if men "man up" and speak out against attitudes and actions that victimize women and girls, Malarek said.

Further, he said schools must teach boys and girls about gender equality and healthy relationships.

He argued that easy access to hardcore pornography online is affecting boys from a very young age and skewing their idea of what real, consensual sex looks like.

People can address this by lobbying the government to place regulations on the amount of free porn that's available, as well as sponsoring public awareness campaigns that call attention to gender equality, pornography, assault and the exploitation of women and girls on the Internet.

Malarek touched on the federal government's introduction of legislation in 2014 that makes it illegal to purchase sexual services, but legal to sell them.

Critics of the legislation who argue that prostitution should be legalized or further decriminalized in order to empower women in the business are misguided, he said.

"There's this tiny minority of twits who are saying they want to be doing prostitution and their rights are being impugned," he declared, adding, "This business will always be organized by criminals and pimps. Even if you legalize prostitution, you're just giving [these criminals] a legal table to do what they do."

While it's difficult to track numbers of how many women are being trafficked or selling sex – many are too terrified to come forward to the police – Malarek insisted that "Toronto has a very live and wild prostitution racket."

He concluded by telling the audience that gender equality will never be possible unless prostitution of women and girls is eradicated, and added, "This is the biggest enslavement of people since the blacks were slaves in the United States." ■

Jewish Winnipeggers raise funds to rescue Yazidi refugee families

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Last May, a number of members of Winnipeg's Jewish community launched Operation Ezra, a fundraising campaign to bring an endangered Yazidi family to Winnipeg, and it's been far more successful than the organizers could have imagined: it's raised more than $100,000 – enough to save four Yazidi families.

"Considering how successful our fundraising efforts have been, we are now considering further expanding the number of Yazidis we can bring to Winnipeg," said Operation Ezra committee member Michel Aziza. "This is a rare opportunity to do something really good in the world. These kind of opportunities don't come along very often in one's life."

The Yazidi people are an ethno-religious community based largely in northwestern Iraq. The ancient monotheistic religion they practise combines elements from a variety of traditions, including Gnostic Christianity, Judaism, Sufi Islam and Zoroastrianism. Due to a misinterpretation of the role that a peacock angel represents in their religion, they have often been labelled as devil worshippers and have been persecuted throughout much of their history by various Muslim groups in the region.

In the summer of 2014, the little-known Yazidis – who number about 700,000 – shot to international prominence for a short time when ISIS stormed into their region. Many Yazidis were slaughtered or enslaved. Many more fled to Mount Sinjar, where the United States and other western countries dropped supplies to help them survive until they could escape into the Kurdish area to the north or to refugee camps in Turkey. Many perished from starvation, dehydration and at the hands of ISIS.

There are currently about 180 Yazidis in Winnipeg, including Nafiya Naso whose family was one of the first to come to Winnipeg. She and her family arrived in Manitoba in 1999 thanks to the sponsorship of the Pembina Mennonite Fellowship Church in Morden in southern Manitoba. The family lived in Morden for three years before moving to Winnipeg.

Naso said she and her family were originally scared of associating with Jews.

Nafiya Naso

"We were taught by extremist Muslims in a refugee camp when we were growing up that Jews were monsters who killed innocent children," she said.

"We have learned since coming here that the Jewish community are among our best friends. Members of the Jewish community have been among the first to step up to help our people."

The plight of her brother and sister Yazidis in the Middle East came to the attention of the wider Jewish community about a year ago through the efforts of the year-old Winnipeg Friends of Israel, who invited Naso to speak at one of their programs.

"I learned about Nafiya and the plight of the Yazidi people last March from Yolanda [Papini-Pollock, a co-founder of the Winnipeg Friends of Israel] while chairing a Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University program," said Belle Jarniewski. "I was very moved. Being a child of Holocaust survivors, I can identify with the dire situation that the Yazidis find themselves in. What they are facing is a genocide. I felt a moral responsibility to help."

Jarniewski, Aziza, Papini-Pollock and a number of others decided to take action. They learned how to sponsor refugees and explored a number of different avenues. "We don't have a formal campaign," Aziza said. "We just started approaching people and asking for donations. We also had people approaching us. One individual from Alberta gave us $34,000, which will essentially cover the cost to sponsor one entire family."

Jarniewski said it costs $12,500 to sponsor one adult refugee, according to federal government regulations. And there are only a limited number of organizations (sponsorship agreement holders) who have signed sponsorship agreements with the government of Canada to help support refugees from abroad when they resettle in Canada, she said.

"They are generally religious, ethnic, community or service organizations. Private sponsor groups partner with them to bring refugees in. Our sponsorship agreement holder is the Mennonite Central Committee," she said.

"We have also been working through the Mennonite Fellowship Church in Morden, Calvary Temple in Winnipeg and, more recently, with the Jewish Child and Family Service in Winnipeg."

The families that Operation Ezra hopes to bring to Winnipeg currently live in a refugee camp in Turkey. These refugees range from a single young man, 18 years of age, to a family of eight.

"The refugees are living in appalling conditions at the UNHCR refugee camp where summer temperatures often reach 50 degrees Celsius," Jarniewski said. "The winter that lies ahead is going to be equally challenging. And there are no school facilities available for the children."

Despite funds being in place, Aziza said it will take between six and 18 months for the refugees to arrive in Canada. "We are going to be engaging as many people as we can to try to expedite the process," he said. "We are going to push as hard as we can to get them here as soon as we can. It is not safe for them in the camps." ■

Board decides to sell Hamilton JCC building

SPECIAL TO THE CJN, HAMILTON

The board of Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre has decided to sell its 28-year-old building due to dwindling membership, but its co-president, Lowell Richter, said he believes the move will result in renewal and revitalization for the institution.

Until the community settles on when and where to build a new facility, and how to fund it, the JCC will continue to run programs at other locations, using what Richter calls a "virtual model."

The JCC board of directors concluded that the costs associated with upkeep of the west-end facility were "not the best use of community funds," Richter recently announced at a community meeting.

"The current location was designed as a tennis club. It is too big and difficult for us to manage," he said. "We don't have the critical mass to support the current location."

Another drawback of the property is that the adjacent 30 acres of undeveloped land fall under the jurisdiction of the Niagara Escarpment Commission, which makes it, according to Richter, "extraordinarily limited as to what it can and can't support" in terms of allowable development and prospects for a sale.

He said he spent close to two years working with city planners to explore usage options for the greenbelt-designated land.

Richter would not divulge the number of current JCC members, but said that with a limited pool of funds to draw from and declining membership, the JCC can't sustain its seven-acre property, which includes facilities such as indoor tennis courts, a fitness room and squash courts.

But Richter wants to assure the community that the JCC will continue to serve it. Hamilton is currently home to about 5,000 Jews.

"We are not going away. We want to be stronger. We want to re-focus and realign ourselves with the realities of our community," he said.

"Our board has reached the conclusion that the JCC needs to build on our strengths and let go of the things that slow us down. In short, we need to reinvent ourselves, so that we can become more relevant to a greater number of people," Richter added. "What we do best, we will continue to do."

He said this includes the popular Camp Kadima day camp, the Morris Black Public Speaking Contest and Max Rotman Humanitarian Youth Awards, as well as cultural programs for Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut. These programs will be run at other locations in Hamilton until a new JCC building opens.

Over the coming months, the JCC board, along with other community stakeholders, will start to craft a vision for the future, Richter said.

"We want to have a [physical] footprint, but in a sustainable way. This might happen right away or it might be down the road," he said. "Many successful Jewish communities function in a campus-like environment. This is what we envision for our community as well, with the JCC acting as an anchor. Until then, we will follow the virtual model."

He told The CJN that plans were put forward in 2008 to renovate the current JCC, but the board couldn't get financial backing after the economy went into recession.

Richter isn't sure when the JCC will vacate the current facility, but programming there is scheduled until at least the end of this year.

In its heyday throughout the 1950s and 1960s, the JCC was located on Delaware Avenue in downtown Hamilton. When Jewish families and synagogues started to move west to Ancaster, Westdale and Dundas, the Delaware location was sold. In 1987, the JCC moved to its current location in a wooded valley on Lower Lions Club Road in Ancaster.

While he said he can't disclose details, Richter said there are parties interested in the current location.

The exact value of the property is uncertain, but its assessed value for property tax purposes was $2.3 million for 2015.

He said the decision to sell the building has invigorated board members.

"We can build it the way we want to build it and right-size it for us," he said. "The JCC is not closing. It is transitioning into something that's more viable, sustainable and efficient." ■

Updated dementia handbook aims for practicality

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Education is empowering for a person coping with caring for someone with Alzheimer's disease or other types of dementia.

That's the idea behind Dementia: A Caregiver's Guide, a book published last month by Baycrest Health Sciences.

Geared to professional caregivers or family members caring for a relative, the book lays out strategies for dealing with 21 day-to-day health and lifestyle challenges often faced by people with dementia, and offers practical tips for preventing and managing them.

Dementia was co-written by Bianca Stern, executive director of culture, arts and innovation at Baycrest, and Nira Rittenberg, an occupational therapist with the Baycrest Geriatric Psychiatry Community Service, and was reviewed by about 20 health-care professionals at Baycrest.

"This is a very difficult disease and a long journey... We try to make [caregivers] their own navigators, to be able to cope [with these issues] in the day to day," said Rittenberg, who also runs support groups for adults caring for a parent with dementia.

She stressed that the guidebook can't be taken as "a cookie cutter formula," but rather a starting point from which caregivers can mould an approach that works for them.

Dementia is an expanded and re-named third edition of a resource initially published by Baycrest in 1999 called Caring For Your Loved One.

The new version includes sections on communication, eating, bathing, dressing and grooming, sex and intimacy, nourishing the spirit and navigating the care system, as well as three additional chapters, on travelling, sleep, and mouth and dental care.

Nira Rittenberg

> This is a very difficult disease and a long journey... We try to make [caregivers] their own navigators, to be able to cope in the day to day

There's sufficient research about dementia online that someone could spend "morning to night reading about it," Rittenberg said, but the Baycrest handbook is meant to be unique in that it tries to avoid inundating readers with information and scientific facts.

Instead, the book includes some basic facts about dementia – all of it sound and evidence-based, Rittenberg emphasized – but hones in on concrete strategies for dealing with specific issues.

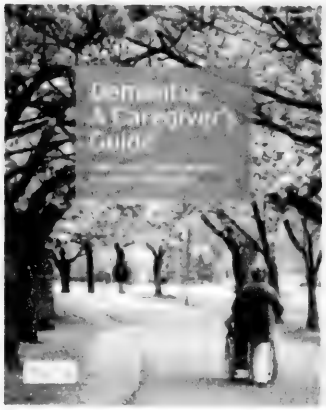
The chapter on safety and the home environment, for example, encompasses several sub-sections on ways to achieve home safety, such as avoiding too much change in the home, concrete tips for making the person's home safer and less stressful, and ways to prevent accidents.

In addition to updating content according to new best-practice standards for dementia management, Rittenberg explained, the caregiver handbook's latest iteration has modified certain elements that felt outdated, starting with the book's name.

"We got a lot of pushback from the former title, Caring For Your Loved One, because people said it doesn't recognize that someone might be caring for a person they don't love. And it's true, people care for others for different reasons –[such as] out of respect or because they have to. So we wanted to take away that piece of judgment around it," Rittenberg said.

The new edition also reflects the ways the approach to caregiving has changed in recent years

This includes both a greater understanding of how important the quality of care is to a dementia sufferer's physical and mental health, as well as recognition of the impact caregiving can have on the person administering it.



The book, therefore, has a section devoted to self-care for caregivers, and Rittenberg said she and Stern were careful to use language that is neither dictatorial nor preachy, to help caregivers navigate options without taking on undue stress.

People caring for relatives with dementia are often adult children sandwiched between caring for a sick parent while raising a family, she added, making the disease something of "a family illness."

Factors like this can make caregivers susceptible to mental health issues such as depression or anxiety.

"When I'm caring for a client [as an occupational therapist], their caregiver is as much my client as the person with dementia," she said.

The guidebook is being sold for $27.99 on the Baycrest website and in its gift shop, and Rittenberg said the ultimate goal is to also make it into a downloadable e-book. ■

The 'trickle intifadah' that just won't stop

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

Police and rescue workers at the scene of an attack at the Central Bus Station in Be'er Sheva, on Oct.18. One Israeli soldier died and many were injured. MEIR EVEN HAIM/FLASH90 PHOTO

If Israelis thought for a moment that the wave of terror attacks was weakening and may even cease, the recent events were a rude wake-up call. This is no run-of-the-mill spate of attacks, and sadly it may be a while before it subsides. It is no longer a "trickle" of sporadic attacks. The last several weeks have seen little respite from the terror attacks or attempted attacks. The "trickle" isn't stopping.

The Palestinians are calling it the Al Quds Intifadah. Of course there'll be those who say the current situation doesn't even come close to the bleakness of the two previous intifadahs, and they will probably be right. There may be a popular dimension to this intifadah, but it is still marginal. Even during Friday's "Day of Rage," only a few thousand people took to the streets of the West Bank. The turnout was so meagre that users on Hamas-affiliated Internet forums accused West Bank Palestinians of no longer bothering to leave their homes to confront the occupation forces and support the struggle to liberate Jerusalem's Al-Aqsa Mosque.

Instead, we are witnessing a new kind of intifadah characterized by lone wolves, young knife-wielding Palestinians. Most are from East Jerusalem, but over the past week they've received a significant boost from the younger generation in Hebron.

Why has Hebron now rallied to the cause? First, we must point out that it would have been possible to find explanations had suicidal attackers emerged from other cities. The fact that attackers are not coming from other West Bank cities is surprising. Indeed, the markedly half-hearted commitment displayed by West Bank Palestinians in this semi-intifadah is one of the few positive trends that one can point to.

Like Jerusalem, Hebron is an easy place to carry out attacks. The terrorists do not need to leave a West Bank town or village and infiltrate Israel through checkpoints in order to find victims. Both are mixed cities, and in Hebron, in Area 2H, Palestinians and Israelis live side by side and intermix practically 24 hours a day.

The Temple Mount in Jerusalem and the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron are holy to both Judaism and Islam, and regretfully inspire sickening actions in the name of religion, or jihad. In addition, both cities contain a core of extremist ideologues who are prepared to take violent action against Jews.

Hebron has been known as a Hamas stronghold for dozens of years, and despite massive Israeli efforts in security and intelligence, and the Palestinian Authority's (PA) attempts to intercept attackers coming from there (including arrests of Hebron residents), there is no shortage of extremists who are prepared to die in order to kill Jews.

The bad news from Hebron has a silver lining. First, the rest of the West Bank is not rushing to join the melee. This stems from Palestinians' lack of appetite for a full-blown intifadah, but also from the efforts of PA President Mahmoud Abbas who, at least in terms of security co-ordination, continues to play by the rules. His security forces are making significant efforts to stop terror attacks that could lead to a full-scale conflagration in the West Bank; his troops have arrested Hamas operatives and even dispersed popular protests. Recently, for example, PA security forces quelled a demonstration that emanated from Bir Zeit University, near Ramallah. Protests near the settlement of Beit El have continued, but on a smaller scale. The bottom line is that security co-operation remains in place despite all of the stresses it's experienced.

The problem, as ever, is that we are living on borrowed time. Abbas' capacity to stem protests, including some by activists in his Fatah party, isn't assured for long. Eventually, the members of Fatah and its violent Tanzim movement will join the fray.

Until now, this has been an intifadah under at least partial control, but without some kind of diplomatic initiative or an effort to prevent escalation, it is only a matter of time before Israelis and Palestinians pass the point of no return.

Since an Arab-Palestinian-Israeli summit is still not on the horizon, for the time being, Israelis don't have much choice but to hunker down, prepare for more attacks, and hope things won't spiral utterly out of control. ■

Both power and peace needed in Israel right now

There is a solution, although it's not simple and not quick. It can be expressed in the Hebrew words oz (power) and shalom (peace).

Oz refers to power both physical and ethical. Military and civil power. Unity of our people. Preventing Israel from splitting into "tribes" ("settlers," "Tel-Avivians," "leftists," "haredim"). Supporting those who are on the front lines of the struggle. Determination to face the hardships associated with Israel's existence in the Middle East and willingness to pay a high price when necessary.

Shalom refers to maintaining our Jewish and universal ethical values, even when the other side does not. Continuing to extend the hand of peace (while the other hand holds a loaded gun), even when we are not certain there is anyone who will grasp it. A brave, unflinching look in the mirror to remind ourselves who we are, why we are here, and how we want to see ourselves. Managing to overcome the tension between the two commandments, "Remember what Amalek did to you" (Deuteronomy 25) and "The stranger who dwells with you… love him as yourself, because you were strangers in the Land of Egypt" (Leviticus 19).

The combination of oz and shalom is imperative, even in the case of Asraa Zidan Tawfik Abed, a 30-year-old mother of three, who on Oct. 9 brandished a large knife and tried to stab a Jewish soldier at the Central Bus Station in Afula.

It was an act of oz to stop her, to shoot her in the legs and prevent her from implementing her plot. At the same time, we also need an approach of shalom: to feel sorrow and pity that we have reached a situation in which an Arab mother of three leaves her children in order to stab a Jew; to wonder whether there was another way to neutralize the threat she presented; and to refrain from hate and fear toward Arabs just for being Arabs; and to continue to strive for peace with our neighbours. ■

Memo to the CBC: Israeli lives matter

Gerald Steinberg

> Many media reports rely heavily on political groups that press their agendas under the facade of expertise in human rights.

The gruesome routine is familiar. Israelis are hunted down by Arab terrorists, and we are condemned for defending our lives. In the media, headlines focus as least as much on the murderers as on their victims, and when a knife-wielding Palestinian teenager is shot during his rampage, it's referred to as a "summary execution." A recent New York Times headline read "Stabbings, and deadly responses, add to Israel's security challenge" – describing the responses, and not the attacks, as "deadly."

As is generally the case, many media reports rely heavily on political groups that press their agendas under the facade of expertise in human rights. The New York Times quoted a number of such groups including Amnesty International, which accused Israel of using "excessive force" to stop the attacks. Similarly, activists from the Israeli NGO known as B'tselem and the Palestinian group Al Haq are quoted as if they were experts on international law and ballistics.

However, as is very often the case, the officials of these organizations have neither the information nor the professional credentials to make such judgments, and by giving them legitimacy, journalists are simply perpetuating the myths. Such compilations of quotes from selected sources and pseudo-experts, cut and pasted into the automatic media framing based on Palestinian victimization and Israeli aggression, have largely replaced serious journalism with professional standards.

In many cases, the Canadian media is no exception to this pattern. In listening to CBC Radio news programs, we hear the same distortions, biases, and clichés found elsewhere. (In my years of observing the hundreds of foreign journalists in Israel, the degree to which reporters travel in packs, automatically repeating each other's slogans and frameworks, stands out strongly.)

For example, on Oct. 9, Margaret Evans reported from Jerusalem on CBC Radio's flagship World at Six news program, presenting the emotionally laden version of Palestinian victimization that she has used for many years. On a day when two Israeli men were viciously stabbed to death in Jerusalem's Old City in front of their families during the holiday of Sukkot, she instead chose to report from Ramallah, focusing on Palestinians "frustrations" and the funeral of a 19-year-old who, she said was "shot dead by Israeli security forces," only adding as an afterthought that he was the murderer who stabbed Aharon Banita and Nehemia Lavi. CBC listeners heard her emotion-laden voice, describing the anger "starting to burn bright again" among youth who confront armed Israeli soldiers at "checkpoints."

Evans either doesn't know the history or doesn't care – she simply echoes Palestinian propaganda lines, as she did during previous stints in Israel many years ago. For her, there is no background prior to the 1967 "occupation," the checkpoints have nothing to do with security necessary to prevent terror, the hateful anti-Israel incitement is erased, and the conflict is reduced to a "game of cat and mouse" between frustrated Palestinian protesters and powerful Israeli soldiers.

Later in her report, she added some Israeli voices for artificial balance, asserting, with no evidence at all, that the "stabbings have spooked the Israeli leadership." The murdered Israelis remained anonymous to Evans, while listeners were told that the "people mourning them are Jewish settlers who want a foothold in the Muslim Quarter just up the road from the Al Aqsa compound." This allegation, like the others, has no relation to journalism.

Evans ended with a string of clichés, invoking the "cycle of violence," which has created "dark seemingly immovable matter of a stagnating conflict turning out new generations of conflict" – whatever that means.

The assessment of the professional qualifications and actions of CBC reporters, and actions to be taken in response, are issues for Canadians to consider. But the lives of Israelis are deeply affected by these distorted and harmful portrayals in the international media. ■

I hate my gun. I am grateful for my gun.

My gun is my barometer. It has been in my possession for 37 years. Most of the time it rests securely in my safe, taken out only when I need to pass my re-certification, or to be put in secure storage in a gun store when I travel overseas. It is my barometer, for every few years I feel the need to carry it on me (for which I have a permit). Every few years my sense of safety and that of my family and my fellow citizens is undermined, as the streets on which we walk and live become the frontlines. It is my barometer for the moment when I no longer know if the person with whom I share these streets is there to pursue a normal life or to pursue me and those around me.

I hate my gun, but I am grateful for it too. I don't feel that I have a constitutional right to bear arms, and my gun is not meant to protect my civil liberties from a tyrannical, abusive government. I do feel, however, that I have an inalienable right to live and to do what is necessary to defend myself, my family, and those around me from those who desire to murder us.

I hate my gun, because I don't want to live in a world in which everyday citizens need to be responsible for their own safety. I hate my gun, because my life's work as a teacher and rabbi is geared to fostering kindness, decency, mutual respect, and hope. I hate my gun because it reminds me that my family is not safe and my life's work is far from realization. There is no part in my soul which wants to harm another human being. There is no part in my soul which wants to see an other as an enemy. The opposite is the case. I am an unrepentant optimist who believes in the inherent decency of humankind and in the possibility of peace and rapprochement between Israel and our Palestinian neighbours.

I believe that there is nothing inherently flawed in Judaism or Islam which forces us to be at war with each other. I believe the opposite to be the case, and a significant portion of my work is to develop new levels of understanding, respect, and learning to and from each other. I hate my gun.

I am grateful for my gun. I hate that I need it, but I am grateful for the fact that when I do, I have the ability to carry it. I hate the fact that the people I love are in danger, but I love the fact that neither I nor my people are helpless victims anymore. I love the gift of Israel, that if and when I need it, I do not merely have the right but the ability to protect myself.

I know that my gun is not the answer. I know that my gun alone will not give me the safety and security for which I yearn. I know that my gun is dangerous. I know that it can delude me into a false sense of power, wherein as long as my gun is bigger the status quo is sustainable. As long as my gun is bigger, I don't have to take chances for peace. I know that my gun can blind me to the feelings and rights of others. It can make me acutely sensitive to my security needs without any reciprocal sensitivity to the needs of others. I fear my gun and what it can do to me and my people.

> I hate my gun because it reminds me that my family is not safe.

I need my gun. I know that the occupation has gone on for too long. I know that an occupation is justified only to the extent that one does everything in one's power to bring it to an end, and I don't believe we have done so. I don't believe that we have done everything in our power to make the lives of the Palestinian people as free, safe, and prosperous as their rights as human beings demand. Is our failure the cause for the recent stabbings and murders? I believe that the perpetrators of evil are the ones who bear primary responsibility for their actions, and the murder of civilians as they sit in buses and walk the streets of their cities is nothing short of evil. We Israelis must take responsibility for our moral failures and do everything in our power to rectify them; however, the responsibility for terrorism lies within the terrorist and the society which glorifies it. As long as they do, I need my gun.

My gun is my barometer, and today I am walking with my gun. I read the lies of the so-called plot of the Jews to destroy al-Aqsa and am saddened at the ease with which my neighbours can be rallied to kill and be killed to "redeem" it with blood. I am saddened that my neighbours ennoble and glorify anyone who murders my fellow citizens and grant them and their families' financial rewards far in excess of what they could ever have dreamed of earning peacefully. I am saddened when instead of taking responsibility for children who have chosen the path of murder, they lie to themselves and transform these children into innocent victims.

I dream of two peoples living side by side in peace and security. I know that there is much that I and my people have done to undermine this dream. But I also know that too many within Palestinian society have yet to truly accept that this is my home too, and have yet to make the strategic commitment to peaceful co-existence between us. There is no political solution on the near horizon, and whether there will be one in the more distant future at all, will require much work and transformation on both sides. I fear that the current reality will only weaken our will to even explore such fantasies, let alone contemplate steps to even allow it to be put back on the table. I still live with hope and continue my life's work to create a better future, but until that day comes, sadly and tragically, from time to time, I will carry my gun. ■

Jerusalem residents learning how to defend themselves

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

After weeks of non-stop knife attacks, the mood in Jerusalem is grim. But many Jerusalemites are finding ways to respond proactively to the mood of terror in the city. They're stocking up on pepper spray and signing up for martial arts classes, proving their desire to keep right on living in the nation's heart.

Roi Walther, with Royce Gracie jiu jitsu, led a seminar Oct. 12 in Jerusalem's Sacher Park. His goal was to give participants "the courage to walk on the streets... They know what to do if something happens."

Walther offers a common-sense approach. The minute you identify that an attacker is approaching, Walther says, "Scream 'Knife!' and point at him."

Pointing is crucial, he says. "You can scream 'Knife!' but nobody knows who has a knife. Pointing at the person, you can save others' lives."

Don't back away, he adds. "He's running forward, you're running backward. He's faster." Instead, focus on breaking the attacker's hand holding the knife. "Nothing else will work... if you choke him, he will stab you."

Krav maga, the Israeli martial art, is also taking off. Ruth Kilner, who made aliyah from Scotland 11 years ago, signed up for classes with a group of local women following the Har Nof synagogue attack last year. That attack really hit home, she says. "It's just so close to our reality."

Kilner lists two principles to using krav maga in a knife attack. First, "You attack, you don't defend." And second, "You attack the hand that's holding the knife. That's the dangerous bit. You can beat on someone's chest as long as you want, but if he's stabbing you with a knife, there's only so long you can last."

She also carries pepper spray when she travels outside her neighbourhood, though that's rare now. "I'm not leaving Ramot if I can help it. We're trying to just stay close to home."

An ultra-marathon runner, Kilner bought the spray to defend herself against wild animals, never dreaming she'd need it so close to home.

Israelis turn to pepper spray, krav maga for protection

Former lone soldier Jeremy Nye has launched an initiative to make pepper spray available at a low cost or free. Following the Har Nof stabbing, he collected donations and distributed 1,000 cans of pepper spray.

Through his website, pepperspray.co.il, he has launched a new fundraising campaign. "We have thousands of messages from people all over the country," requesting free and subsidized pepper spray, says Nye, a four-year oleh from the Fort Lauderdale, Fla., area.

Nye's site also offers information about where to buy pepper spray throughout the country. But calls from The CJN to Jerusalem-area stores turned up only one that had the spray available. Every other store was out of stock.

While Kilner is sticking close to home, Laurie Tamres, an olah of five years, must travel by bus each day for work. She calls this daily travel a "calculated risk." "We live with it all the time, but right now it's at a very heightened level."

Though she has no choice about whether to travel around the city, she has switched to a different bus stop. "I could catch the 13 bus in several places," she told The CJN. "I choose to catch it up by the president's house. It makes sense to me, I know there's a lot of security around there." She's planning to attend a one-day krav maga seminar.

> People in this country don't stop living their lives ... They're going to keep living their lives no matter what happens, because that's what we do in Israel.

Like Kilner, Tamres also carries pepper spray, upgrading recently from a small key-chain spray to a larger, military-grade spray. "It sprays a lot further... it's a lot more powerful."

But it's not enough just to tuck it in a pocket or backpack. "Even during the day, I have it in my hands. I definitely have it ready to go."

Few who carry the spray have had to use it. But on Oct. 13, in Jerusalem, civilian Matan Shukrun used his personal pepper spray to help subdue a terrorist who had driven his car into a bus shelter. However, on Oct. 11, three girls were allegedly taken into police custody after spraying an Arab store worker without cause.

Walther cautions against overconfidence in carrying pepper spray. "I'm not a big believer," he says. A well-known study has shown that when police officers tried to draw a weapon against an attacker less than 10 metres away, they couldn't. "The only weapon that can work [at that distance] is your body."

Nye does provide training whenever he gives out pepper spray. He is aware of its limitations, but believes it's valuable for a sense of security. "That's very important when people are freaking out and scared."

However, one former Torontonian, who requested anonymity, remains skeptical. "I think all this pepper spray will make a lot of money for the importers and not help, except to give a dangerous false sense of security." From videos of attacks, he says it's clear that few victims have enough warning. "I understand how [pepper spray] could be helpful against a rapist... But there is literally no defence from an Arab coming up from behind or the side."

Israel's government announced Oct. 14 that it would loosen the nation's strict gun-control laws in "high priority" areas, including haredi neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. Since many haredim have never served in the army, they were previously ineligible for gun permits.

Despite the ongoing attacks, Nye loves that "people in this country don't stop living their lives. I'm seeing videos from all over Jerusalem, showing people on the bus, on the train, singing, cheering. They're going out and dancing, they're not going to stay at home. They're going to keep living their lives no matter what happens, because that's what we do in Israel." ■

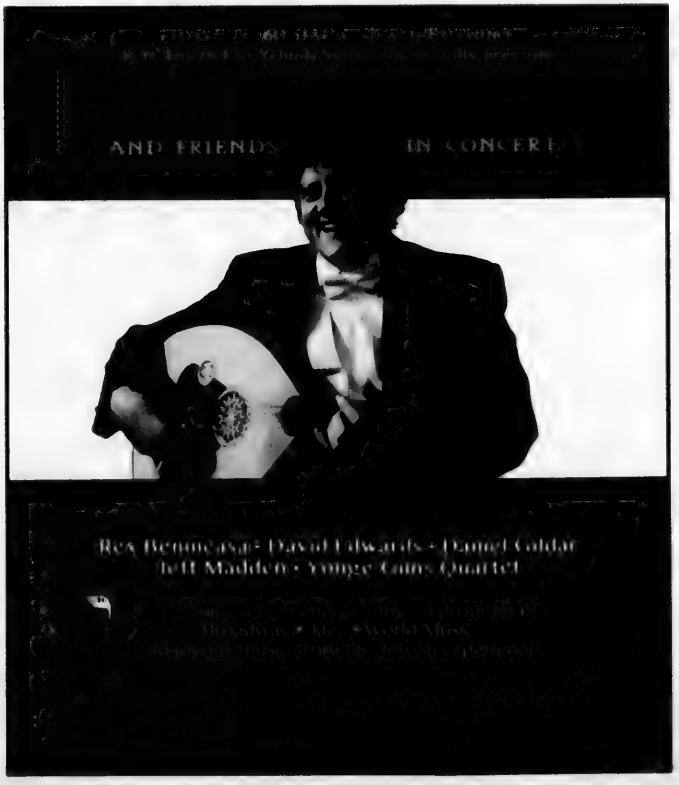
A Jewish Humanitarian Response to Poverty



Anti-terror strategy is ineffectual – and also crucial

JUDAH ARI GROSS
JERUSALEM

The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) are sending an additional 300 soldiers to assist police in Jerusalem, the army said last Thursday. Six companies of cadets, amounting to several hundred soldiers in officer's training, have already been sent to reinforce police in cities around the country.

Some of the soldiers already in place, and the additional ones joining them this week, come from non-infantry units, predominantly the Military Police and the Homefront Command, an outfit that provides search and rescue services and emergency response in times of war, the police and IDF said.

It is the latest in a number of measures trotted out by the security cabinet in response to the stabbing attacks that have rocked Israel in recent weeks and sent the population into a panic. Another notable and even more dramatic move by the cabinet early last week was to put in place a so-called "breathing closure" around East Jerusalem neighbourhoods, setting up checkpoints at the entrances and exits but allowing the resident population a level of mobility.

An Israeli soldier stands guard in the Orthodox neighbourhood of Mea Shearim, Jerusalem on Oct. 19. The IDF is assisting police in Jerusalem. YONATAN SINDEL/FLASH90 PHOTO

The purpose of these closures and IDF reinforcements has been twofold: on the one hand, there are the tactical and operational benefits of these checkpoints and reinforcements. And on the other hand, there is the matter of public perception, and the need for the Israeli political leadership to project to its citizens that things are under control.

The majority of the attackers since the beginning of October have indeed come from East Jerusalem neighbourhoods, and the largest number hailed from Jabel Mukaber, which was also the hometown of the terrorists who attacked a Har Nof synagogue last year, killing five. For the past year, young men from the city have also thrown rocks and Molotov cocktails at residents of the adjacent Jewish Armon Hanatziv neighbourhood on a nightly basis.

The problem, however, is that truly separating Arab neighbourhoods from Jewish ones in East Jerusalem is nigh impossible. That, ironically enough, is due to the Israeli government's efforts for the past 40 years to unify the city, Marik Shtern, a researcher at the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, told The Times of Israel.

Since capturing East Jerusalem in the 1967 Six Day War, the government set out to "unify Jerusalem and to combine the two sides' economies," Shtern said.

And in that effort, the government was successful. In the early 1970s, Armon Hanatziv was built side by side with Jabel Mukaber. The two neighbourhoods share playgrounds and clinics and supermarkets. Pisgat Zeev and Shuafat are equally close and intermeshed.

And as a result, in barely 24 hours, the "breathing closure" on East Jerusalem failed more than once. The attack outside of Jerusalem's central bus station on Oct. 14 was carried out by a resident of Ras al-Amud; hours later, four residents of East Jerusalem firebombed a Border Police base in Atarot.

Full lockdown of East Jerusalem has never happened

While Israel could perhaps close off the neighbourhoods to cars, that would not necessarily stop individuals from leaving. "OK, you closed off a road," Shtern said. "But people can't walk? They can't ride bikes?"

In the short term, the only way Israel could entirely ban East Jerusalem residents from West Jerusalem or other Israeli cities would be a massive deployment of police or soldiers into the neighbourhoods' main streets, Shtern said.

However, he admitted, "I work more to bring people together than keep them apart."

A full lockdown of East Jerusalem has never been implemented in the 48 years it has been under Israeli control, not even during the first and second intifadahs. Though there have been lockdowns and curfews in West Bank cities, even these have been rare and never lasted more than 24 to 48 hours.

And today, not only would a true closure be immensely difficult to implement, it could also have dramatic unintended consequences, Shtern said. Not only would it be severely damaging to East Jerusalem residents, it would be detrimental to West Jerusalem as well.

Approximately 50 per cent of workers from East Jerusalem are employed in West Jerusalem and some West Bank settlements,which is somewhere between 30,000 and 35,000 people. If those people suddenly could not go to work, the results would be dire for all of Jerusalem's economy, Shtern said.

The purpose of the "breathing closure" can therefore be seen as largely symbolic.

"[The government] wants to show the Jewish population that it is doing something," Shtern said.

Even Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan, who, along with Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, has been one of the most vocal supporters of the closure, has admitted that it will not be perfect.

"Can I say that this 100 per cent guarantees that nobody will enter Jerusalem or possibly acquire some weapon they can use to stab people? No," Erdan told Israel Radio when the closures were announced last week.

In addition to the IDF soldiers who are already assisting law enforcement, the Israel Prison Service also decided last week to put some 400 prison guards at the Israel Police's disposal.

Tel Aviv's police department alone received approximately 100 soldiers, most of them officer cadets, who will assist in patrolling public spaces such as the Dizengoff Center mall and the outdoor Carmel Market, Channel 2 reported.

Additional law enforcement in cities around the country will potentially act as a deterrent to would-be attackers and will allow for a quicker response to attacks.

However, these actions too can be seen for their symbolic as much as for their operational value. They provide a sense of security in a time when attacks have come in large and small cities and suburbs around the country in both residential and commercial areas.

As of 2014, the Israel Police had close to 30,000 full-time officers and nearly 70,000 volunteers. Though an additional 700-1,000 soldiers will certainly assist police officers, they amount to a very small percentage of the total law enforcement in Israel.

That the additional soldiers and "breathing closure" of East Jerusalem are operationally ineffectual does not diminish their role in this escalating rash of violence.

In light of the recent attacks, Israelis have been on edge. An IDF officer fired his weapon inside of a moving train on Oct. 15 after passengers saw a "suspicious" person and shouted, "Terrorist!" No terrorist was found on the train, but several people were lightly injured when the train's emergency brakes kicked in.

Hours later, the Israel Police conducted a massive manhunt, employing a helicopter and shutting down major highways in Tel Aviv, after reports came in of another "suspicious" vehicle, driven by two East Jerusalem residents. The Shin Bet interrogated the pair and found no evidence that they had planned to carry out a terrorist attack –they were only electricians out on a job. ■

PA is engaged in a policy of incitement, CIJA says

They include condemning terrorism; taking security action to stop terror attacks; denouncing anti-Jewish conspiracy theories; and "cracking down on Palestinian religious officials, media, social media, and others who call for jihad, especially those encouraging Palestinian teenagers to commit suicide attacks."

One particularly bone-chilling video, released by the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI) shows a cleric in Gaza brandishing a knife and citing Islamic scripture to justify the stabbing of Jews.

CIJA also asked its supporters to email Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Opposition Leader Isaac Herzog to let them know "Israelis are not alone."

CIJA chief executive officer Shimon Fogel said "we are asking the community to engage politically and with the UN." Fogel said Ban had taken a "ridiculous position" that called on Israel to investigate the deaths of Palestinians, but had not mentioned the terror attacks.

Fogel was also scathing in his criticism of media reports from the region, which had defaulted to describing events as a "cycle of violence, as if there's no beginning or critical path."

He said the Palestinian Authority was engaged in a policy of incitement, which included the unfounded claim that Israel was threatening to destroy the mosque on the Temple Mount or change the status quo regarding prayers on the holy site.

Not only is that patently false, but the government of Israel had taken the step of prohibiting cabinet ministers from visiting the site, in a bid to de-escalate tension, Fogel said.

The media also incorrectly reported "this trope of Palestinians as despairing of peace, the peace process and economic opportunities. Journalists have really failed on this one."

It was the PA president, Mahmoud Abbas, who appeared in the United Nations recently and declared the Oslo peace process was dead and that he would not be bound by it, Fogel noted.

"We're really frustrated that the media was looking for every opportunity to depict Israel in as negative way as possible," he said.

In a telephone conference call last week, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, DJ Schneeweiss, suggested supporters of Israel could take several steps. "Become knowledgeable" about the situation and take to social media to inform friends and colleagues of the facts, he said.

He suggested that Canadians support charities that aid victims of terror, hold solidarity events, prayer vigils and visit Israel to convey first-hand a message of support.

> We're really frustrated that the media was looking for every opportunity to depict Israel in as negative way as possible.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko was part of the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus delegation delivering a letter to the Palestinian diplomats. He told The CJN that Abbas' speech at the UN gave the green light to Palestinians to undertake violent attacks. He rejected Palestinian leadership's claims that Israel was changing the status quo on the Temple Mount, saying it was the Palestinians who denied the right of Jews to pray there and who "denied the history of the place.

"That calls into question the Palestinian capability of accepting the Jewish presence in the Holy Land," he said.

Meanwhile, at least two Toronto synagogues hosted prayer services and shiurim (lessons) to honour the terror victims. An evening of remembrance was held at Yeshivat Or Chaim, while Kol Torah Congregation hosted an evening of prayer for the victims.

In Hamilton, Temple Anshe Sholom, Beth Jacob Synagogue and the Adas Israel Congregation co-hosted an evening of solidarity, prayer and information in conjunction with several Hamilton-area Jewish organizations.

Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom, which supports emergency services in Israel, called on its supporters "to remind everyone that all Israeli ambulances must constantly be re-stocked with emergency and medical supplies as well as kept in an ever-ready emergency mode. We are asking for everyone's co-operation and support in helping us fund the continuous flow of these crucial life-saving provisions assuring that no life is placed in danger due to dwindling supplies," the Canadian office stated.

And Kari Zalik, national manager of student affairs for the Rothberg International School at Hebrew University, said "All the students, after the chagim [holidays], were immediately sat down and given a security briefing on situational awareness."

None of the approximately 25 Canadians studying in the program, nor their parents, have indicated they wish to come home early, she added. ■

FOCUS ON EDUCATION

Bright future for Ontario university graduates

NEWS CANADA

Ontario appears to be recovering and headed for growth after years of economic challenges, improving the outlook for both the employment and earnings of university graduates, according to a new report, University Works.

The report, newly released by an economist with the Council of Ontario Universities (COU), says the unemployment rate for university graduates in February 2015 was 4.2 per cent – the lowest among the population.

"In fact, university graduates experienced the highest employment growth of any educational attainment group over the last decade," says Patrick Deane, COU chair and president of McMaster University. "They are getting jobs related to their skills, and on average Ontario University graduates earn 58 per cent more than graduates from other Ontario post-secondary programs."

The report says Ontario university graduates consistently outperform the rest of the population in employment and earning outcomes. That's true for all ages, including recent graduates.

Citing data from Statistics Canada's National Household Survey, the report says the average high school grad earned $38,808 (during the last year data was available), while the average Ontario college grad earned $47,706, and the average university grad earned $75,396.

"When lifetime earnings and employment rates are considered, a university education is still one of the most resilient and personally fulfilling investments a person can make," says Deane. ■

Lassonde students study entrepreneurship in Israel

A group of students from the Lassonde School of Engineering at York University spent this past summer taking part in an intensive entrepreneurship program at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa.

Twenty-four graduates spent three weeks immersing themselves in Israel's entrepreneurial culture, learning business lessons from professors and CEOs and exchanging ideas with young Israelis.

"The summer experience at Technion has quickly become one of the flagship programs offered at Lassonde. The quality of academic instruction at this world-class institution is unmatched and the "dream it, do it" culture of the society is infectious," says Janusz Kozinski, founding dean of the Lassonde School of Engineering.

"Most importantly, each one of the students returned inspired to see the world differently and ready to imagine their own entrepreneurial ideas to solve great challenges."

The students spent their first week of the program learning the fundamentals of entrepreneurship and commercialization. They then departed Haifa to visit technology startups, entrepreneurship incubators and venture capital firms located across Israel, including in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

The opportunity to study entrepreneurial success stories in-person from the architects of an economic model that's often called the "Start-up Nation," was an unbelievable experience for these aspiring entrepreneurs. Israel has more technology startups and attracts more venture capital per capita than any other country in the world.

"It's like learning magic from Albus Dumbledore, straight from the horse's mouth," says Amal Dave, a second-year Lassonde student who took part in the program. "Over these three weeks, we learned how to be an entrepreneur. We learned to be business people from experts in that field.

"We visited various startup companies and met many CEOs, [and we were] stunned by their simplicity and passion for their work. No one cared about wearing formal clothes or working in a fancy workplace. All they cared about was their company and the people they worked with," Dave says.

This summer entrepreneurship program fits perfectly in the Lassonde School's ethos of hands-on learning.

Rendering of Lassonde School of Engineering at York University

The curriculum of the Lassonde School focuses on teaching a breadth as well as depth of knowledge, together with a hands-on approach to learning.

It is upending the traditional classroom structure to give students a chance to test out and practise real-world skills. In their new home on the York University campus, The Bergeron Centre for Engineering Excellence, for example, there are zero lecture halls. Students can increasingly take lectures whenever and wherever they want online, but while in the classroom they are focused on solving problems in small groups with fellow students and professors.

The entrepreneurship program delivered in partnership with Technion extends this concept of active learning, and allows students to absorb more in three weeks than many students will learn over three years of lectures.

"Those three weeks in Israel were probably the best of my life so far," Dave says. "We saw some amazing sights, we learned some very valuable lessons, and we formed some bonds that will last a lifetime." ■

Athletes aim for the top

Joel Dembe won a bronze medal at the Parapan Am Games.

HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

Two Canadian athletes achieved their dreams in August winning medals in the Parapan Am Games in Toronto.

Alison Levine won a silver medal in mixed pairs in boccia, a precision ball sport related to lawn bowling.

And Joel Dembe won a bronze medal in men's doubles wheelchair tennis. He and national team member Philippe Bedard beat out the United States' Steve Baldwin and John Rydberg. Dembe also competed in the men's singles and finished in the top eight after losing to Argentina's Gustavo Fernandez.

Levine, 24, was born and raised in Montreal. At 12 she started exhibiting symptoms that led to the diagnosis of a degenerative neuromuscular disorder that causes weakness in all her muscles and also affects her breathing.

She enrolled in various sports including therapeutic horseback riding. When that became too dangerous, she tried wheelchair basketball and then wheelchair rugby. She eventually began to play boccia, the only sport suited to her level of disability

Dembe, 31, who lives in Hamilton, was born with a spinal tumour. It was removed at a very young age but left him partially paralyzed. During his childhood, he became active in sports and played track and field, sledge hockey, baseball and golf. He was introduced to wheelchair tennis at 13 by a former top Canadian player, Frank Peter Jr.

"I took to the sport right away," Dembe says. "I had eye-hand co-ordination and the ability to push my chair fast, which helped."

Dembe went to high-performance junior tennis camps and entered world competitions in Europe and North America during high school. He competed around the world and became the top ranked junior in Canada.

Levine has also competed nationally and internationally. She is known for her powerhouse strength and aggressive playing style. Within two weeks of starting boccia, she was recruited to the provincial team along with her current doubles partner, Marco Dispaltro. Within three months she and her partner became the Canadian doubles champions. After six months, Levine was selected to be a part of the national team.

"I firmly believe that my sports background has contributed to my immediate success in boccia. Right from the start, I understood the commitment and dedication that would be required to become an elite level athlete, and I was ready for it," Levine says.

> I took to the sport right away.

Levine is now ranked second in Canada, ninth overall in the world and the first woman in the world to reach this status. She competes in the BC4 category for athletes with severe disabilities affecting the whole body. She spends four five-hour days a week in the gym training and practising. She also spends many hours with her coach studying videos of past games, viewing her opponents' movements and strategies.

Levine likes boccia mostly because of how quickly the game can change.

"With one shot, your whole game plan can go out the window. You can expect some situations, but then someone will make a crazy shot and you're suddenly up against the time limit. You only have a few seconds to analyze, decide and execute," she says.

Dembe, meanwhile, attended Brock University and studied sports administration but still played tennis on the side. He started working with different tennis coaches and refined his game. He developed his strength working out at a gym and began travelling on his own to different world competitions. By the time he finished university, he was ranked in the top five in Canada.

In 2010, he decided to elevate his game so that he could represent Canada at the London 2012 Paralympics. At that time, he was ranked number 4 in Canada. He left his job working in a financial institution as a market analyst to focus entirely on wheelchair tennis.

Dembe won tournaments in Mexico, California, Vancouver and Montreal. He competed at the 2011 Guadalajara Parapan American Games and became the top player in Canada in 2011. He competed in four continents on his way to getting a spot in the London 2012 Paralympics. Unfortunately, in London he lost in the first round to one of the top British players in singles.

Flawed characters seen against backdrop of Israel's first years

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Young Israeli authors are creating a stir of late, calling a great deal of positive attention to themselves and to their imaginative works.

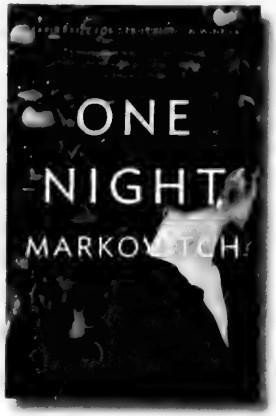
Last month, JTA published a story about "seven acclaimed Israeli expatriate writers" who are establishing themselves as talented literary figures. Some months before the JTA story, Forward literary writer Beth Kisileff wrote a story that was titled, rather emphatically, "Eight New Israeli Writers You Need To Read Right Now."

Like Israeli society in general, many young Israeli writers give a place of high honour to fearlessness in seeking and recounting truth, as they see it. And, in pursuit of that truth, they often assiduously dissect the core stories of the founding of the country as taught to them by the older generations.

Although she was not included in either of the above feature stories, Ayelet Gundar-Goshen is among the new generation of authors being lauded by Israeli critics. Gundar-Goshen is an award-winning author who has written or co-written several screenplays and TV series. At the age of 33, she is an experienced writer with a diverse writing corpus to her credit.

One Night, Markovitch is Gundar-Goshen's first novel. It was well received and widely acclaimed in Israel as a stirring, richly depicted literary achievement for which the young author received the Sapir Prize for Debut Fiction. Panoramic in scope, bold in its telling, One Night, Markovitch is an epic tale of the founding of the State of Israel. It begins prior to the creation of the Jewish state, during World War II, when the Jews of Mandatory Palestine were trying to build a new society even as they were offering their assistance to defeat the Nazis in Europe. The story ends sometime after the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

But a novelist in the pursuit of truth will likely tread a different path than, say, a historian. Thus, while the sweep of the novel is commendably wide, covering the full expanse of key epochal events in the rise of the fledgling state, Gundar-Goshen introduces us to literary characters, each of whom is deeply flawed, in some cases even psychopathic, or just plain lacking the fundamentals of conventional, normal behaviour.



One Night, Markovitch
Ayelet Gundar-Goshen
Translated by Sondra Silverston

Pushkin Press

The core of the plot is based upon the effort during World War II to rescue Jewish women from Nazi Europe by arranging marriages for them and bringing them to Mandatory Palestine as wives of men already resident there. Once the "couple" arrived in Palestine, the arranged marriage would be summarily dissolved by the rabbinate.

But one of the new instant husbands, Yaacov Markovitch, is so captivated by his "wife's" overwhelming beauty that he rejects his role as faux husband and refuses to grant her a divorce. He clings to the chimeral hope that he and the beautiful Bella Zeigerman will one day transform into a truly loving couple. But she is abject in her complete rejection of Markovitch. She is cold, unfeeling and constantly cross with him. Marcovitch sleeps alone on the sofa clinging to Bella's nightgown but never to her.

The myriad consequences of Marcovitch's reversal of course – his "sin" as it is sometimes called – resound throughout the book and hammer away at the tarnished, bent metal of the story until the very end.

Marcovitch's attachment to the feeble, frail hope of requited love is likely more than a description of the man's most compelling character trait. It probably stands as a metaphor by Gundar-Goshen for a far more significant relationship: that of the modern Jewish People to the modern Land of Israel. She implies this relationship in an exchange between Marcovitch and his best friend, Ze'ev Feinberg. In most every way, the two men are opposites. But their friendship is true and long lasting, tested by dire circumstance. Thus, the question is legitimate: does their conversation represent more than a rebuke between friends?

"Going to bed with a nightdress and hoping you'll wake up with a woman in it? You must have fallen on your head. It'll never happen, not in a year, not in 20."

"So in another 30, or 40. You know what, Feinberg, maybe never. But I hope, and that's something too. And maybe if I hope enough, if I hope really hard, that hope will turn into something real. Look at us. Look at this country. Two thousand years we've been hoping for her, waiting for her, sleeping at night with our arms around the sleeves of her nightdress, because what is history if not the sleeves of a nightdress that has no smell? And you think she wants us? You think this country returns our love? Nonsense! She vomits us up time and time again, sends us to hell, beats us down without mercy. With the Romans and the Greeks and the Arabs and the mosquitoes. So you think that someone here says, 'If she doesn't want me, I should go?' Someone here says, 'There's no point in holding a country by force if she's been trying to get rid of you from the minute you came to her?' No. You hold on to her as hard as you can and you hope. You hope that maybe she'll finally look around and see you and say – that one. That's the one I want."

The answer to the above question, therefore, is: yes. Most definitely.

Gundar-Goshen is too sophisticated a writer, especially with the word "hope" – Israel's national anthem – reverberating in the air like a stuck metronome, to be so unsubtle about her intention for the grand theme of the story.

Readers will require patience. The writing is complex. The atmosphere is bleak. And the characters are challenging. ■

Old Jews, and young ones, hold nothing back

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

As it goes in the opening number in the off-Broadway hit, Old Jews Telling Jokes, the cast proves that "there are times when it's kosher for a Jew to be a ham."

The show, now playing at the Randolph Theatre, co-created by Peter Gethers, editor, publisher and president of Random House Films, and Daniel Okrent, a writer and editor, and best known for having served as the first public editor of the New York Times, will amuse anyone who can appreciate classic Jewish humour, and doesn't mind re-hearing an old, although re-worked, comedy gem.

The show was adapted from the Old Jews Telling Jokes website, which features videos of, well, people telling jokes. But on stage, theatre-goers can expect more than a stand-up routine.

The cast, featuring Allan Price as Morty, Theresa Tova as Bunny, Jess Abramovitch as Debbi, David Gale as Nathan and Alan Kliffer as Reuben, acted out their roles as if they were caricatures of old world Jews – to the point where Jackie Mason might even think it was a little much.

Some of the cast from Old Jews Telling Jokes

Kliffer, a Winnipeg native who graduated from the Randolph Academy and The Second City Conservatory, one of the two young Jews telling jokes, stole the show, often garnering big laughs from the audience with his over-the-top delivery and facial contortions.

As for the material itself, there was a mix of short, expletive filled jokes (Daddy, where do babies come from? A stork. Who f---s the stork?), jokes with long-winded setups acted out by the five-person cast, as well as musical numbers.

The 90-minute show is also broken up into themes, such as marriage, retirement, business and money. Woven throughout the show were monologues that touched on the important role humour plays within Jewish identity, how it helps bring people together, and in some cases, cope with difficult moments in life.

In Bunny's story, Tova, who once starred as Yenta in Fiddler on the Roof at the Stratford Festival, tells a story about a woman who grew up not wanting to be funny. Ironically, it is her sense of humour that gets her fired from her job at an ad agency. But it was also her wit that compelled a co-worker to start a new agency with her – one that ended up successful enough to buy out the agency from which she was fired.

In Reuben's story, he recalls getting a phone call while out on a date with his girlfriend. It was a call from his father, who was informing his son that he was dying of cancer.

"A year later, he was lying on his death bed. I asked him if he was comfortable. He shrugged his shoulders and said, 'I make a living.'"

Although the show is very much about the jokes, the crass one-liners [My boyfriend got the words, "I love you" tattooed on his penis. I told him to stop putting words in my mouth], and a likable cast that holds nothing back, the show also has some heart, reminding the audience that in good times and bad, a Jewish sense of humour is often what binds a people together. ■

Old Jews Telling Jokes runs until Dec. 6 at the Randolph Theatre,736 Bathurst St., Toronto. Tickets cost between $45 and $65. Call the box office for tickets at 1-844-448-7469. playhouseinfo.com

The Multi-Award-Winning Film is Back By Popular Demand! A powerful drama based on a true story. Movie about Nazi war criminals opens this week

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Benjamin August moved to Los Angeles a decade ago to try his hand at writing movies, he began to work on what he thought would sell. Years later, his first story to get its screen debut is a psychological thriller about a 90-year-old Holocaust survivor with an unreliable memory.

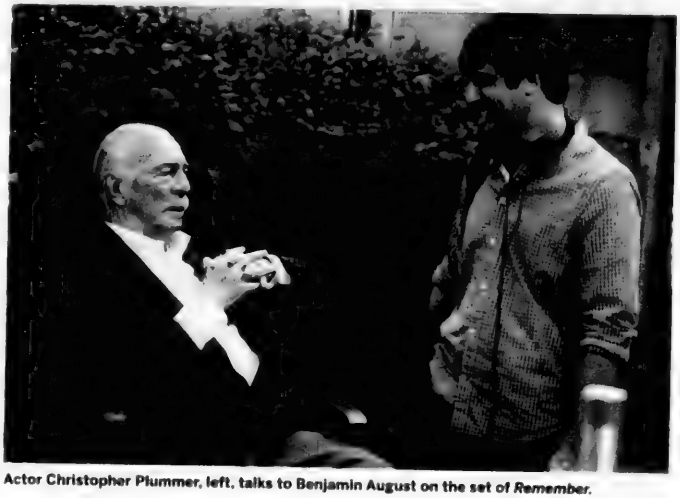
Of course, not the easiest story to sell to a film producer.

"When I had the idea for Remember, [my manager] said, 'this is a super hard one to sell because no one likes movies with old people, but it's an awesome idea, and good ideas find homes.'"

That home ended up being with Canadian producer Robert Lantos, who had never before decided to produce a screenplay with a story he hadn't developed.

Remember premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival in September and is set to open in theatres across Canada on Oct. 23.

In the thriller, directed by Atom Egoyan (The Sweet Hereafter), Christopher Plummer plays Zev, an aging Holocaust survivor. After his wife dies, Zev decides that he has little to lose and begins to search for the Nazi guard responsible for his family's murder at Auschwitz, whom he believes is still alive.



Actor Christopher Plummer, left, talks to Benjamin August on the set of Remember.

Despite the ubiquity of news stories about war criminals coming out of hiding and receiving prosecution, August says that wasn't an inspiration for this story.

"It started more with wanting to write a movie starring an older man," says August, 36. "I just felt like there are so many great older actors, like Christopher Plummer, who don't get lead roles anymore."

While Remember has similarities to Christopher Nolan's Memento, August adds that The Straight Story, a low-key American drama that earned actor Richard Farnsworth an Oscar nomination at age 79, was also an influence.

"There's something about older people that we trust," he says. "It makes us a little more sympathetic to them in their journey, so we're rooting for them."

The subject matter was also inspired from August's time living in Vietnam. He moved there from Los Angeles during the writers' strike in 2007 to teach English as a second language.

Nevertheless, the topic of war criminals evading punishment resonated with the scribe during his time there, from guilt of what some American soldiers did to the Vietnamese during that protracted war.

Writer refined script for years

"These people got to live a full life," he says of war criminals. "That thought is something that really inspired me to write. Have they changed? Do they reflect on what they did? Or are they cowering every day in fear of being recognized and being caught?"

August, a Jewish native of New Jersey, didn't lose any direct family in the Shoah, although he says he vividly remembers the tattoos on the arms of his Hebrew school teachers.

The first draft of Remember only took August one month to write, but it wasn't until a couple years of rewrites before the screenplay ended up in Lantos' hands.

"I knew since it was such a hard script to get made, it had to be in really tiptop shape," he says.

While he worked on various scripts during his time in Los Angeles, including a few comedies, the only major screen credit August received at the time was as a producer on the reality show Fear Factor.

Looking back at the hokey comedy scripts he worked on as he tried to break into the industry, August says they are embarrassing to look at.

With two other thrillers lined up for production – including one for Black Bear Pictures, the studio behind The Imitation Game – August has a good plan to remain engaged in what he writes.

"The goal... is to make people ask questions after [the film]," he says. "I think an audience is going to walk out [of Remember] and say, 'What would you do? Did you see that twist coming?'"

"If you're not asking questions, then we did something wrong." ■

Book tries to unlock a family mystery

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Myrna Neuringer Levy

To many people, the image of the shtetl is linked to Sholem Aleichem's fictional story Fiddler on the Roof.

In Shattered Stones, Scattered Seeds: The Story of the Shtetl and a Family Who Lived There, author Myrna Neuringer Levy, presents a view of history through her family which covers two centuries of Jewish life in the shtetl.

In her memoir, Levy attempts to unfold a family mystery through the backdrop of the 19th and 20th centuries in eastern Europe and the mass immigration to America.

Curious about a photograph of her grandmother Clara Neuringer, who never left the Galician shtetl of Borchov (Borszczow) when her husband and sons left for New York, Levy researches several sources to try to solve the mystery.

These sources include, the Yizkor book on Borszczow written in Yiddish and translated by Miriam Beckerman in 1960, letters written by her grandmother to her husband in New York, a family history her grandfather wrote of the extended family and a photo album of numerous pictures her father took when he went to Poland to visit his mother Clara in 1933.

Although the mystery of why Clara did not leave with her family is not solved, the book describes the events that created this mystery while projecting a vivid picture of the living conditions in the shtetl and historical events, including the world wars and the Holocaust.

Levy presents a vivid picture of everyday life, dowries, education, anti-Semitism and the hardships the Jews faced and how it affected family relationships.

Levy has included maps and numerous photographs.

Her grandmother's letters, saved by her grandfather and found after his death, leave confusion as to the breakup of the family despite the rise of Nazism. Levy questions why her grandmother didn't leave at that time.

The Jewish residents of Borchov and the nearby towns were placed in a ghetto and were massacred in attacks between 1942 and 1943.

"I was about six years old at the time, not an age when you ask pertinent, relevant questions that needed to be asked, should have been asked," she said. "The world was at war. How did a letter get out of a place occupied by the enemy? How long did it take for the letter to arrive at our apartment in Brooklyn, N.Y.?"

Levy told The CJN that she has had an unexpected reaction to her book from people who are not members of her family.

"For many Jewish and non-Jewish people, it has brought out stories of their own families. For others, they say that it gave them an insight on shtetl life and the immigrant experience."

All of Levy's material is now with YIVO in New York. The Yizkor book translation is available online at JewishGen.org.

Levy, a former elementary special education teacher and librarian, has published three books for children. She was born and educated in New York City and moved to Toronto after her marriage to Ed Levy. ■

Shattered Stones, Scattered Seeds is available at Israel's, Aleph Bet, and it can be ordered on eBooks from Chapters, Barnes and Noble, Amazon or visit www.myrnasbooks.com.

Producer tackles tense topics for TV and movies

HEATHER SOLOMON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, MONTREAL

Ina Fichman of Intuitive Pictures is at a happy place in her career as a producer.

The Wanted 18 that premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) last year, won the top documentary prize this summer at the Traverse City Film Festival in Northern Michigan headed by Michael Moore. She has hopes it will go on to compete for an Oscar.

The 75-minute film, co-directed by Montrealer Paul Cowan and Palestinian Amer Shomali, is set in the Middle East during the first intifadah in the 1980s.

It's about a community of pacifist intellectual Palestinian professionals in Beit Sahour outside Bethlehem who decide to create their own dairy farm, a step in controlling their lives and providing for their own needs.

The story, based on a real-life incident, is told not only from the point of view of these men and women but also using the Animal Farm-like voices of a small herd of Israeli cows, portrayed in stop-motion animation.

The cows, purchased from a sympathetic kibbutznik, "find themselves in the middle of a mess" when Israel deems them a threat and seeks to have them removed.

One cow is depicted as a staunch Zionist, another becomes a Palestinian sympathizer and a third "goes through a metamorphosis in terms of how she feels about being part of what's going on there." The bovines lend absurdity and humour to the sensitive subject.

Animation was done in Montreal by a team of 10 Concordia University film graduates "working out of an old shmatte building on Chabanel that we converted into an animation studio with shooting stations," says the producer.

Now Fichman is expanding the film's creative footprint to include an interactive graphic novel that involves readers using their tablets to navigate through the village, choose chapters, play games and access bonus content like recipes and the story of Israel.

"It's entertaining but at the same time, it has content. We're offering it as a free app," says Fichman.

Another of her projects, 100 Percent T-Shirt about the history of the T-shirt, has gone interactive, with the company website "asking people to share their T-shirt stories and photos.

"People hold onto their T-shirts for years because of memories. I still have my Camp Ramah T-shirt," says Fichman.

"Over the next year we're going to be choosing four causes and asking designers to create a shirt that reflects the cause. They'll be printed and the money will go to the cause.

"The first, on the theme of girl power, is connected to a film I produced last year called Monsoon [that won the Audience Choice award of TIFF's Top Ten]. In it, a young woman in Kerala in the south of India wants to become a nurse so we set up an education fund for her."

An illustrious woman is the subject of Fichman's most recent film, Vita Activa: A spiritual biography of Hannah Arendt, a Canada-Israel co-production directed by Ada Ushpiz and featuring Alison Darcy (Maurice Podbrey's daughter) as Arendt's voice and archival footage.

"It's a look at Hannah Arendt's philosophy on the banality of evil and the plight of the refugee, its connection to her life and what it means today," she says.

"We just signed with U.S. distributor Zeitgeist and it will be released in the States early in 2016. We're doing a shorter version for Radio-Canada to be televised next year."

Fichman is just starting production on a sequel to Abbey Neidik's Shekina that follows a group of chassidic girls into womanhood, with some leaving their communities. After more than 25 years working out of Montreal, with local as well as global partners, Fichman is here to stay. ■

Athletes represent Canada around the world

He was also unlucky in doubles, losing to the top British team in the first round.

No stranger to honours, Dembe was the Canadian Paraplegic Association Male Athlete of the year in 2011. He was also awarded the 2012 Queen Elizabeth Diamond Jubilee Medal.

In 2014, he was part of a cross-country tour of Canada Cares. This is a non-profit organization that creates a sense of community for family and professional caregivers by increasing awareness and providing encouragement.

He recently joined RBC as part of the RBC Olympians Program. There, he'll be involved in marketing and sponsorship across the Greater Toronto Area. He'll also be involved with coaching as part of Tennis Canada's new junior wheelchair tennis team. He has announced his retirement from competitive tennis.

"My goals are now career-based. I hope to grow the sport of wheelchair tennis, and help develop future stars of our sport here in Canada. I've just become a Tennis Canada-certified instructor and will also be obtaining my next level of coaching this winter," Dembe says.

He has primarily been delivering speeches in schools over the past few years. Now he's focusing on the corporate world. "I hope to motivate anyone on the importance of overcoming obstacles, physical activity and hard work."

At this point, he's not sure if he will participate in the next Paralympics. "I'm still relatively young for a complete retirement," he says, "so I can't give a definite answer about this quite yet." His focus now remains on his post-athletic career.

For Levine, this year has been packed with setting goals and achieving them. She says she keeps on setting more challenging goals as her career progresses. She qualified for the Paralympics in doubles in May, so she now focuses on qualifying for individuals. She will also attend the world championships in China this year. She is currently doing a GoFundMe campaign to raise money for a new wheelchair.

If not for her disability, Levine says, she would probably never have had the opportunity to represent her country or get to spend her days playing a sport she loves. ■

Alison Levine won a silver medal in mixed pairs in boccia at the Parapan Am Games.

Just Jewish enough

David Levine

After seven long years in Los Angeles, Aaron Miller was about to give up. The Canadian-born actor was growing tired of being passed over, season after season, for leading roles.

Miller, 32, is a rising star whose talent and charisma have shone since he first caught the acting bug at age 12. His acclaimed performances on stage and screen led to his decision to move south, where he was included on countless lists of the "next big things" to expect from Hollywood.

But the roles never came.

"It would always go the same way," remembers Miller. "Casting directors love me, they want to work with me, and I'd never hear from them again. I could never understand it."

As the rejections – and the bills - started mounting, Miller decided to find out, once and for all, what was going on. Was this just bad luck? Had he said the wrong thing to the wrong person? Had someone started a troublesome rumour about him?

"I started asking anyone I met, 'What's going on? What have you heard?' And I started to hear this one answer again and again."

The answer is an old, dirty Hollywood secret: Aaron Miller didn't look Jewish enough.

"That really came as a surprise to me," says Miller. "Back in Montreal, everyone could tell I was a Jew. They'd shout it at me from across the street! But this is Hollywood, and things can be a little superficial when you're up for an SSP."

An SSP, or "supportive semitic partner," role (also known as Rudd Roles), is the holy grail of parts for young Jewish actors like Miller, allowing them to flex their self-deprecating comic chops in leading romantic comedy roles.

"An SSP may not always get the girl, but he'll always get a punchline," says Miller, calling it "the role I was born to play."

But the SSP needs to strike a delicate balance – the popular adage demands that the SSP be "likeable, but not cool; attractive, but not threatening and clever, but not smooth," he says. And even though he has the phrase tattooed on his forearm, Miller's perfectly proportioned facial features were holding him back.

The last straw for Miller came in 2012, when he lined up auditions for eight SSP roles, but was ultimately passed over for all of them in favour of Jason Segel, Paul Rudd, Seth Rogen, Andy Samberg, Adam Scott, Zach Braff, Josh Radnor and Bill Hader, respectively.

That's when Miller made the decision that would forever alter the trajectory of his career – he opted to undergo a surgical procedure designed to optimize his facial features for "ethnic-cinematic equilibrium" in screen tests.

The surgery is not without controversy – critics in the press and social media have attacked Miller's decision to "go native" – but he defends his decision.

"I had a lot to offer," he explains, "but I can't offer anything if no one's looking at me."

Miller doesn't regret his decision, but he advises caution to aspiring actors who might choose to follow in his footsteps:

"Looking a certain way is only the beginning. I see a lot of guys in auditions – they saved up to get their noses enlarged, and then they head straight for Hollywood. But no one's buying it."

For Miller, the surgery meant increasing the visibility of his semitic features by approximately 32 per cent.

"Do I wish it hadn't been necessary? Of course. But it's a demanding industry. I've got nothing to hide."

And the industry is certainly looking now, with Miller's star on the rise since his return to the scene. Significant Oscar buzz swirls about his post-surgical portrayals of Dan Green, the insecure watchmaker looking for love in a digital age in Time and Again, and Ben Stone, a widower and single dad who accidentally starts dating both of his daughters' teachers at once in Two Apples.

Through it all, Miller remains humbly dedicated to honing his craft. "There are no shortcuts to success," he maintains. "Only surgical ones." ■

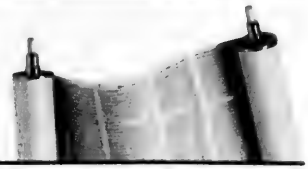
Lech Lecha | Genesis 12:1-17:27



Rabbi Aaron Katchen reflects on the balance between individuality and community
Rabbi Michal Shekel offers a lesson on how to deal with people, possessions and priorities
Rabbi Howard Morrison explores the unique relationships each of the patriarchs built with God

Aaron Katchen

"God took him outside and said, 'Look at the sky, and count the stars if you can! So will be your descendants'" (Gen. 15:5), "and as the sand on the seashore" (Gen. 22:17).

I have long considered myself a follower of the teachings of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook (Rav Kook), the first chief rabbi of pre-state Israel. Until recently, I have mostly relied on my teachers and others to access his words. For the past year, I have struggled through learning and teaching the Torah of Rav Kook myself, and I would like to share an idea he raises in Midbar Shur, relating to the blessings Abraham receives from God in Lech Lecha.

God uses various analogies to express the magnitude of the descendants of Abraham. One is like the stars above and another is like the sand on the seashore. Each star is enormous. It has its own purpose as well its own name (or opportunity to be named). Whereas sand, although there are formulas to quantify the world's sand, each individual grain is irrelevant, except when it finds its way into our eye or drink.

For Rav Kook, these metaphors are meant to represent both an individual Jew and the Jewish People. Any given star represents an individual Jew. It is a universe unto itself and has infinite value. As the Talmud teaches, whoever saves a life, it is as if they have saved an entire world. The opposite is true as well.

The sand represents the Jewish People and our collective goals. In that context, individual grains become inconsequential. Collectively, though, beaches are formed, and dry land becomes a buffer from the sea.

By creating the balance between our individual worth and the necessity of community, we understand the power of God's blessing and promise to Abraham about the potential of us – his descendants. ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen, who is based in Toronto, directs Ask Big Questions Canada in partnership with Hillel.

Michal Shekel

"O Lord God, what can You give me, seeing that I shall die childless" (Genesis 15:2). This is a powerful, provocative question from Abram in reaction to God's promise of protection and great reward.

Lech Lecha is an incredible journey filled with blessing. When Abram leaves his home in Haran for Canaan, he is a wealthy man. When there is a famine in Canaan, he heads to Egypt, where his encounter with Pharaoh results in increased wealth. Upon his arrival in the Negev, we are informed: "Now Abram was very rich in cattle, silver, and gold. " (Genesis 13:2). At Hebron, God promises him land.

Yet possessions are not Abram's priority, people are. We are told that Abram journeys from Haran with an entourage. This group is traditionally understood to consist of individuals who came to believe in God because of Abram and Sarai. We see Abram's priority carried out when he frees a kidnapped Lot and rescues other people in the process. He turns down a reward offered him by the king of Sodom, though, admittedly, he accepts reimbursement for provisions.

Lech Lecha offers a lesson in dealing with possessions, people and priorities. For Abram, material wealth is worthless when measured against the value of people.

The importance of Abram's query is demonstrated by another individual less fortunate than Abram: Hagar. In the same parshah, Hagar runs away due to the harsh treatment she endures under Sarai. She is convinced to submit to it because her reward, like Abram's, will be a son who will be a great nation. For Hagar, suffering is endurable if done for the sake of progeny.

Whether one is Abram, Hagar, you or I, it is not your station in life, but the people in your life that imbue it with meaning. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ont.

Howard Morrison

Parshat Lech Lecha introduces us to the beginning of the Jewish People. We learn about the spiritual journey started by Abraham and Sarah. It will continue with the second generation pioneered by Isaac and Rebecca. Their experience will be perpetuated by the third generation of Jacob, Rachel, and Leah. Every daily Amidah begins with a paragraph known as Avot, the Patriarchs. Nowadays, many Jews in the more liberal movements add the names of the matriarchs. All Jews, mention the patriarchs – Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The beginning of the Amidah focuses on Zechut Avot, the merit of our ancestors. We don't petition God for anything. Rather, we praise God and make reference to the first three generations of our history.

The text does not simply state "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Rather, the text states, "The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Why is God's name mentioned three times? Didn't the founders of our faith all believe in the same God? While monotheism is a fundamental Jewish contribution to the world, the repetition of God's name before each of patriarch's name suggests that each understood God in his own way. The talmudic lesson that Abraham instituted morning prayer, Isaac instituted afternoon prayer, and Jacob instituted evening prayer may be associated with the idea that each patriarch developed his own personal relationship with God.

We have completed an intense month of holidays on the Jewish calendar. Many of us have grappled with complex ideas in the siddur and machzor over the past weeks. May we all find a place in the daily liturgy of our tradition. The core prayer of every service is the Amidah, also known as Ha'Tfillah – The prayer." Seven days a week, at least three times a day, the opening begins with the notion that each of our founders found his special relationship with God. May we follow in the footsteps of our patriarchs and matriarchs and find our special place with God as well. ■

Old and new converge at bistro

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Queen Street West between University and Spadina avenues was an ultra-hip enclave of art galleries, specialty book stores and indie-designer clothing shops during the '70s and '80s, but the area has become more mainstream in recent years.

Many independent retailers have been replaced by chain stores like Gap, American Eagle and Zara's. Despite these changes, this Queen Street strip is still home to many of the iconic bars and restaurants that have been drawing people to the area for decades.

One of the oldest of these culinary institutions is the venerable Peter Pan Bistro at 373 Queen St. W. The restaurant, at the south-east corner of Peter and Queen streets has been a neighbourhood landmark for almost 40 years.

Last year, the ownership changed and chef/owner Noah Goldberg, 32, took over. He reopened the newly renovated eatery in the spring, restoring it to its former art deco glory.

Back in 1927, the place was known as Peter Pan Lunch, but the stained glass and pressed tin ceiling date back to the Victorian era.

In fact, Goldberg points out that there has been a restaurant in this building since the 1890s.

Enter Peter Pan and one feels the convergence of old and new. The polished wood of the original art deco banquettes gleams as does the long white marble bar. Despite its Victorian roots and art deco fixtures the restaurant has a modern feel.

On this sunny Friday afternoon, the mood in the kitchen is upbeat as the chefs and sous-chefs prepare for dinner. They strain an emerald-coloured pea soup through a fine mesh, white and green asparagus are trimmed and ready for grilling, and miniature challahs are rising on large baking pans on the counter.

Yes, Goldberg serves challah on Friday night. "We have a bread program. Every bread is made in-house every day," he explains. "I have a baker who's here with us. We have four different sourdoughs and we do challah on Fridays. We use the left-over challah for French toast for weekend brunches."

He says the menu changes weekly. "It's driven by what's fresh on the market and seasonal."

He even serves fiddleheads and nettles when they're in season.

A popular item, salmon roulade, is teamed with hand-made latkes, but salmon panzanella, poached salmon served in a vinaigrette with tomatoes and watercress, is also on the menu.

There are also a variety of salads – arugula with mushrooms and goat cheese, or grilled asparagus with enoki mushrooms and Parmesan.

Goldberg's career path has not followed a traditional trajectory. He was an economics major at Queen's University, when he discovered cooking, he says. "It was a life skill I fell in love with.

"I was making my own pasta, entertaining friends. Sharing a meal together reminded me of Friday night dinners with the family."

Rather than attend a traditional chef school, Goldberg trained with some of the world's leading chefs. "The cool thing about becoming a chef is apprenticing. You're freelance. It's very hands-on."

His first job was in Toronto. "I worked under Susur Lee, the pre-eminent chef. He brought fusion to the table."

Goldberg spent two years in New York City, in the kitchen of international restaurateur, Daniel Boulud, "one of the big French chefs," before heading to London, England, for a stint at St. John restaurant.

Back in Toronto he learned butchering skills at St Lawrence Market, and for six months, he ran the Feasting Room, a pop-up project.

Goldberg's advice to aspiring young chefs is to choose apprenticeships wisely. "Work at the best kitchen you can find. It's better to start at a lower position somewhere great than at a higher position at a lesser place."

And making the time commitment is critical, he adds. "Be prepared to put in the hours – 16-hour days five to six days a week."

Peter Pan miniature challahs

- ❑ 2 tsp. sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup warm water
- ❑ 7 g instant dry yeast
- ❑ 1/2 cup oil
- ❑ 1/2 cup warm water
- ❑ 1/4 cup sugar
- ❑ 4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 4 cups flour
- ❑ sesame seeds
- ❑ 1 egg beaten with 1 tsp. water

Combine 1 tsp. sugar and 1/2 cup warm water. Let sugar dissolve in water. Add yeast to sugar and water, dissolve and let foam, roughly 10 minutes.

In a separate bowl mix eggs, 1/2 cup warm water and oil. Add to yeast mixture. Combine with sugar, salt, flour. Add half the flour and mix until fully combined. It should be the consistency of batter.

Slowly combine the rest of the flour until the dough becomes soft and tacky. Proof until dough doubles in size (roughly 1 hour). Punch down dough. Let the dough rise again until it doubles (roughly half an hour). For individual challahs, divide dough in 1-oz. portions. Take three 1-oz ounce portions, roll into long logs and braid the challah. Let proof with a damp towel on top until dough doubles in size, (roughly 20 minutes).

Brush the top of the challah with egg wash, and sprinkle on salt and sesame seeds. Bake at 400 for 13 minutes. ■

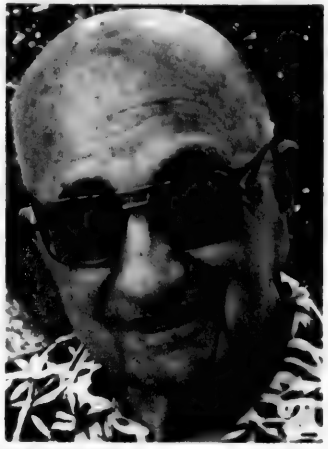
Frederick Krantz: conference to examine Fackenheim's works

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Emil Fackenheim was a philosopher, a teacher, a rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple and a committed Zionist. Although he wrote on a number of topics, he is particularly well known for his proposed 614th mitzvah that enjoins Jews from handing Hitler a posthumous victory. But that is not all there is to Fackenheim, explains Prof. Frederick Krantz. Krantz and the organization he heads, the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) is teaming with Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue to host the annual Sabina Citron International Conference that will examine the Jewish thought of Emil Fackenheim. The event will take place Oct. 25 and include a video presentation by Holocaust scholar Elie Wiesel.

Frederick Krantz



Emil Fackenheim

Why is it important to hold a conference on Emil Fackenheim at this time?

I think there are two related reasons. One is the power and force of his Jewish thought and philosophy. It's a little more than 10 years since his death, and it's traditional to remember a great person, a great scholar, after his 10th yahrzeit.

The second reason for doing this is that this body of thought, expressed in a series of fundamental works, touches precisely on many of the issues we're confronting today. He was concerned with the Holocaust and its implications for modernity, the expression through Holocaust revisionism of denial of the Holocaust, and the growth of anti-Semitism. He was one of the first people to see a new anti-Semitism emerging focused on the State of Israel as sort of the Jew in the world system. His thought is directly connected to the problems that we as Jewish people and more broadly men and women of good intentions face. His thought is alive.

Did you know him personally?

I became very close with Emil. I met him when I first came to teach in Canada after 1969. I was an American by origin. He was running a seminar in Toronto called the Canadian Seminar on Zionist Thought. It was set up after the 1967 war to involved Jewish and non-Jewish academics in the study of Zionism and the State of Israel.

I met this incredible, overpowering character who swept me off my feet with the depth of his learning and the seriousness of his thought. He was a wonderful, sweet, good and at times a funny guy.

He had a major impact on me. Through Emil, in large part, I came back to a sense of my own Jewishness and an awareness of Jewish history and of anti-Semitism.

> He was not a pessimistic thinker in terms of focusing on the horror of the Holocaust. He was profoundly optimistic. It was a miracle for him that the Jewish People survived.

What sort of audience are you hoping to attract?

A mixed audience. It is an academic conference and the people presenting are distinguished academics of great reputation, primarily Americans and Canadians. At the same time, it is open to the public, because we want to showcase his vision, his thought. In his work, he was always addressing the public.

It is important to realize he was not simply an academic speaking to other academics. He had a vision, almost a prophetic vision, of the need to keep issues alive.

Did Fackenheim's influence extend beyond the academic world to that of the average Jew?

I think he had broad support, not only among Jews but among Christians and secular people.

His works were quite popular. He wrote To Mend the World, he wrote The Jewish Return into History. He was a philosopher by training and he wrote a wonderful series of books about the German philosophical tradition, from Fichte in the early 19th century to Hegel.

He was not a pessimistic thinker in terms of focusing on the horror of the Holocaust. He was profoundly optimistic. It was a miracle for him that the Jewish People survived. He said in many of his works that the common-sense thing you'd think would have happened after 1945 was that Jews would convert to Christianity or divest themselves of Jewish identity, for fear that the horror would return and that their children would be caught. He said it was a great miracle that the reverse in fact happened and that Jews of all kinds of identity reaffirmed the nature of their Jewishness, their commitment.

He is well known for his "614th mitzvah." Can you describe what it is?

He invented the "614th mitzvah" (commandment). In our Hebrew Bible, there are 613 laws you are commanded to observe, and Emil in his work came up with a new mitzvah: "Thou shalt not give posthumous victories to Hitler."

That can have many interpretations. How do you see it?

I think the broadest meaning of that injunction is that Jews, but not only Jews, should act so as not to divide the Jewish community. They should support the Jewish State of Israel. It's a fundamental moral, ethical duty.

Emil had no illusions that Israel was perfect, but to him it was a miracle that the state came into existence three years after the Holocaust and through a courageous military struggle against the Arab world's attempt to destroy that state in its cradle. This to him could not be understood in simply secular terms. There was some kind of miraculous quality to it, particularly after 1967 [during the Six Day War], when it looked like the Holocaust could happen again.

Israel was alone, but it triumphed. These things were sort of eruptions of the divine into the unfolding of secular history. For him, God was alive and well in world history and one has to understand that about his work.

One of the critiques of the 614th mitzvah is that it seems negative, to keep one's Judaism not because of the positive aspects of Judaism, but to spite Hitler. How do you see it?

No that's not correct. You keep your Judaism because Judaism is of great value. He held that Judaism is destined to play a role in the salvation of all mankind. That's what our Bible is all about. The Jews are not simply the Chosen People because God couldn't care less about anybody else. The Jews are chosen to carry a heavier burden than others in order to ensure the ultimate salvation of all mankind. That's what Jewish messianism is all about.

Judaism represented for Emil a profound valuable and beautiful phenomenon that is part of world history and part of coming up with a better world. He wrote his book To Mend the World, which taken from the concept of tikkun olam, that the moral imperative for Jews is to play a role in perfecting society.

What additional books did Fackenheim write?

One of the last things he wrote was a book called What is Judaism? And one of things he said in that book is that the God of the Bible, who is also the God of Christianity and the God of Islam, is alive. Emil was a man of faith, and profoundly so.

Emil was also very Jewish. In Judaism you're called upon to act. You are not simply waiting for God to come to your aid. God put you in the world and gave you values, and you ought to act. Man acts in history. Man is free. So at the same time, he could see God's finger writing in history, he understood that history is not passive, that man has to take control, that you have to act on your morality, your ethics. ■

The great illusion revisited

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One hundred years ago, men of war were pulverizing the earth from the Marne to the rivers of Babylon.

This came as a surprise to many thoughtful English observers of war and peace in a new century. Indeed, according to the fashionable progressive ethos of the time, conflict among nations had become obsolete, as diplomacy would resolve international disputes and economic integration would render wars of conquests unproductive.

This was the essence of Norman Angell's book The Great Illusion published in 1909, an instant best-seller and the intellectual foundation of a new liberal cult. Angell's "greatest disciple," according to Barbara W. Tuchman, writing in The Guns of August, was Viscount Esher, a close friend of King George V and the chairman of the Imperial War committee on restructuring the British Army after the Boer War. Convinced that a European war was a great illusion, the good lord gave a series of lectures on the subject at both Cambridge and the Sorbonne, strongly arguing that "new economic factors clearly prove the insanity of aggressive wars."

A 20th century war would be on such a scale that its inevitable consequences of "commercial disaster, financial ruin and individual suffering" would be "so pregnant with restraining influences" as to make war unthinkable. He gave a copy of Angell's work to the German general Friedrich von Bernhardi, who was writing a book entitled Germany and the Next War. The chapter headings were most illuminating and featured gems like The Right to Make War, The Duty to Make War and World Power or Downfall.

In their clubs, the Angell faithful expressed surprise at German militarist candour but dismissed it, as they were convinced that "historical forces" would eventually steer Berlin into the sanguine realms of reason and common sense. With quintessential English condescension, they argued that continentals being continentals often said things they really did not mean.

While the British and French displayed their geopolitical phlegmatic demeanour and insouciance, – with many notable exceptions like the young Winston Churchill and Lord Fisher - the German General Staff was being drilled in theories of war as biological necessity. These were zero sum game notions of race, power, land and honour misappropriated from Darwin and regurgitated through the ramblings of Treitschke: potent elixirs served in Imperial German seraglios of war. The "Kaiserites" were from Mars; the leaders and liberal intellectuals of the Western Democracies were from the realm of the Roman goddess Pax, residing in a gentler place.

From time immemorial, history has shown that nations, confronted with hegemonic powers have not been able to contain their expansionist foes with reason and diplomacy alone. The history of war is the history of the failure of diplomacy. True, there are examples where diplomacy can delay the inevitable for a while. But, this the exception and not the rule. Edward N. Luttwak's monumental The Grand Strategy of the Byzantine Empire is about the history of that exception. How many historical examples can we provide where a weak power relies less on military strength and more on persuasion and gets away with it for 1,058 years? Sooner or later, the vacuum created by the weak is filled by the strong and, finally, even dexterous Constantinople falls before the Ottoman surge.

Currently, we are subjected to a veritable barrage of commentary extolling the virtues of the Iran Deal with particular emphasis on how alleged Iranian economic self-interest would moderate its behaviour, and that the more Tehran is integrated into the global economic order, with billions pouring into its coffers, the more vested the Persian theocracy would become in the maintenance of regional peace, order and stability. One author went so far as to remind us "It's The Economy Stupid," arguing that the issue is not self-monitoring Iran collecting air and soil samples at suspected nuclear weaponisation sites, but how the promised economic nirvana would help both "Israel and Iran." Happy times are here again!

In a celebrated letter to Frederic the Great, Voltaire wrote "History does not repeat itself, men do." Pursuing the same old failed policies of appeasement with annihilationist foes and expecting to wake up in Elysium instead of drowning in blood-soaked trenches is the only Great Illusion. ■

How to know if you've been stabbed, and a match made in heaven...?

JSwipe and JDate hook up

After a public battle over the trademark of the letter "J," Jewish dating services JDate and JSwipe have kissed and hooked up. Spark Networks, owner of JDate and several non-Jewish dating sites, said earlier this month it purchased Smooch Labs, the firm behind the mobile dating app JSwipe. The price will be announced when Spark releases its fourth-quarter financials. The older and larger JDate sued JSwipe last year, claiming a trademark on the letter "J" for dating sites and a patent on technology that helps users find matches. JSwipe's founder, David Yarus, launched an unsuccessful crowdsourcing campaign to pay for more than $300,000 in legal fees. JDate has more than 750,000 users, while JSwipe has surpassed 450,000.

website that asks "Have I Been Stabbed Yet?" A questionnaire lets users figure out "if they are already dead," asking their location – stay away from Jerusalem, it warns – their Jewish appearance (if applicable), and whether they'd summon Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat if they encounter trouble. (Barkat has personally helped subdue several attackers.) Copywriter Shalom Shore and app developer Dan Bystrisky say they created the site to "break the tension" in Israel. "For us, humour is a way to cope, to come to terms with the experience," Shore says. The duo recognizes some won't appreciate their humour, but insist the goal is not to offend anyone, "except for terrorists."

Soccer player sues over Nazi doll

German soccer star Bastian Schweinsteiger is suing a Hong Kong company for making a doll dressed as a Nazi soldier that clearly looks like him. The company, DiD, denied the 30-cm-high doll, named Bastian, was made to look like the player, saying the resemblance is coincidental. The figurine is "based on the typical German," a company representative told the Bild newspaper. "We thought that all Germans look like that." Schweinsteiger plays for Manchester United and captains the German national team. ■

CIJA responsive to refugees

Mitchell Goldberg and Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld's column on Syrian refugees is a gratuitous attack on the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) that simply does not reflect the facts ("The time to act on the crisis is now," Oct. 15).

Contrary to the authors' suggestion, in 2012 CIJA publicly urged the government to maintain equal health care coverage for refugee applicants regardless of their country of origin. We likewise called on the government to avoid separating families (as sometimes occurs) that come to Canada under irregular conditions, re-unify those families quickly when separation is unavoidable, and speed up the process for such claimants to sponsor their families.

In response to the Syrian crisis, CIJA mobilized community members to sponsor refugees, providing information on the process so synagogues and families can get involved through the exceptional work of groups like JIAS and Lifeline Syria. CIJA is also a longstanding member of the Multi-faith Alliance for Syrian Refugees and facilitated a comprehensive political program for its leadership when it made representations in Ottawa some months ago. CIJA is also working directly with the Jordanian government in raising funds to aid the 650,000 refugees currently in Jordan, which will remain home to far more Syrian refugees than Canada could ever admit.

Those who want CIJA to promote a partisan agenda, which for many this issue has become, are unwittingly asking for CIJA and its federation partners to violate Canada Revenue Agency regulations, which explicitly prohibit registered charities from doing so, most especially during an election campaign. CIJA cannot and will not jeopardize the good standing of the federation community to satisfy the parochial and partisan needs of any segment of our constituency.

Rabin's vision

On this sad anniversary of Israeli prime minister's Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, one can't help but wonder if Rabin would be honest about this "vision" and the Oslo accords if he were still alive today ("Realizing Yitzhak Rabin's vision," Oct. 22).

The knife-wielding Oslo generation of Palestinians has now come of age, just the latest murderous graduates of 20 years of Oslo-created PA hate schools, hate textbooks, and hate television stations.

Would Rabin have the integrity to admit that non-stop barbarism for two decades has been the only result of our delusional adherence to the so-called two-state solution?

Would he now encourage the nation to finally let go of this deadly concept, proven false so many times, and effect our full and rightful sovereignty over the whole land?

Would he have the humility to admit that he and all the other well-intentioned Israeli leaders since the 1990s have been spectacularly and fatally wrong?

Post-election regrets

I am sad to read that we Jews have not yet learned, that when we have been uniquely privileged to have as our prime minister a righteous supporter of the State of Israel, we shoot ourselves in the foot and vote for candidates whose affinity is for the Muslim world.

Stephen Harper has stood with Israel through thick and thin, standing up for what is right, as the best friend Israel had in a world increasingly hostile to Israel and Jews. We should have all stood in gratitude with Harper, especially in a riding like Mount Royal, where the Jewish vote could have actually made a difference.

Niqab isn't our problem

Barbara Kay suggests that the niqab represents "a triumphalist ideology" that will support Islamist efforts to "colonize and transform western democracies" ("Rejection of the niqab is self-defence, not racism," Oct. 15).

If our western democracy is so fragile it can't withstand a handful of women wearing veils at a citizenship ceremony, then we truly have much bigger problems to worry about.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Out of difference comes strength

The Jewish community's diversity of opinion on a wide variety of issues is derived from the way Israel's early sages saw the Torah itself

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: I listen carefully to the stories told by each generation of my congregation, and I am a student of our history as Toronto's first synagogue.

To be sure, there have always been differences in political points of view and in religious observance. There have always been small-town Jews and urban Jews; rich Jews and poor Jews; Jews with big families and Jews with small ones; and Jews whose parents or grandparents came from over here or over there.

And yet, it seems the range of experiences and opinions, beliefs and practices today is even more widespread than just one generation ago. Studies give data to underscore what we already knew to be true.

Rabbi Fishman: Two Jews, three opinions – where there are Jews, there is bound to be a difference of opinion.

I believe that this sense of multiple perspectives concerning almost everything is derived from the way Israel's early sages saw the Torah itself. They taught: "Behold, my word is like fire – declares the Lord – and like a hammer that shatters rock" (Jeremiah 23:29).

Just as this hammer produces many sparks when it strikes the rock, so a single verse has several meanings.

What is the "true" meaning of any verse in the Torah? There is no singular answer. Deep down, our essential state of being is to draw multiple – and sometimes mutually exclusive –approaches to everything our people is faced with.

Rabbi Splansky: Synagogues can be a great equalizer, though. On Shabbat, every congregant is honoured for his insight shared at the Torah study table, for her voice that enriches the communal prayer, for their recent loss, for their upcoming simchah. There aren't many places in life that allow for such diversity of character and celebrate it.

Synagogues are often quietly accused of being monolithic and liking it that way. But in my experience, synagogue communities are diverse in their make-up and creatively make space for everyone.

More than that, it is considered a sacred obligation to do so.

Rabbi Fishman: Yes, absolutely.

What I find deeply uplifting is the sense of the whole community coming together, and yet the community comprises so many different sub-groups of people. Some are praying to find a job and put food on the table, while others attend services to say a farewell before their round-the-world trip. Some come to pray for a successful upcoming surgery, while others wish to give thanks and appreciation for the good health they are fortunate enough to have.

And some don't come to pray at all. Rather, they gather for conversation and the social opportunity synagogues provide.

Rabbi Splansky: The 613th commandment must be about more than writing the script of a Torah scroll by our own hand. It calls on us to write relevant Torah in each generation, and that, by definition, we can only do together with others.

The text is fixed, but as the rabbinic tradition insists, interpretation of the text has 70 facets. Diversity of opinion is required in order to discover the truth locked in the text.

This approach is "good for the Jews," so long as each participant is anchored in collective memory, invested in a shared destiny and motivated by them both.

Rabbi Fishman: Rabbi Yaakov Emden (1697-1776) was sure that the text for Kol Nidrei, the declaration of annulling vows on the eve of Yom Kippur, was focused on promises that were made in the previous year. However, another line of reasoning based on the great legal authority Rabbeinu Tam (1100-1171) argued that the proper text should focus on those vows which concern the upcoming year.

Rabbeinu Tam decided to approve a text that combined both versions, explaining his position as one of respect: "since it came from the mouth of that saintly man."

With appropriate honour and a reverence for those we disagree with, perhaps our community can be more inclusive than dismissive. The open-ended possibilities are truly limitless. ■

Every winter, we like to go down south. Who needs the cold at our age? Last year, we signed up for the Benjamin's Funeral Service Listings email. It gives us peace of mind to know that if someone in our community dies, we won't miss the chance to send our condolences. An election that left more questions than answers

Driving along Dupont Street in Toronto on Saturday night, you might have noticed something rather peculiar. Planted in a narrow strip of soil adjacent to a mostly empty supermarket parking lot stood three election campaign signs, one each for Mark Adler, Michael Levitt and Hal Berman, the Conservative, Liberal and NDP candidates, respectively, in the riding of York Centre.

Perhaps, you could have thought to yourself, the campaign staffers tasked with collecting lawn signs in the days after the Oct. 19 federal election had simply missed this troika. Except that explanation would inevitably raise more questions – namely, why would three York Centre candidates have been campaigning in the University-Rosedale riding? And if they hadn't been, as was surely the case, then how had these signs seemingly travelled more than 10 kilometres southward on their own?

Failing to make any sense of this, you could have concluded that perhaps the signs were meant to offer some sort of statement on the campaign that just concluded – something about the deep entrenchment of politics in our daily lives, even after the battle has been won and lost. Or maybe someone had left the signs out, like an old sofa, hoping they would find a good home elsewhere.

Whatever the explanation, the mystery of the misplaced signs might stand as a symbol of the uncertainty left in the wake of the federal election. In this week's CJN, we begin to examine how the results could affect the Canadian Jewish community. Sheri Shefa reports on Prime Minister-elect Justin Trudeau's momentous victory, and the legacy of outgoing Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Meanwhile, Benjamin Shinewald suggests that the Liberal triumph signals a new day for Canadian Jews, while Michael Diamond argues that the Conservative defeat will be a bitter pill to swallow for our community. And in his final Campaign Notebook column, Daniel Wolgelerenter wonders how the election might affect Jewish community organizations.

There are few answers so soon after the election, of course. For now, all we can do is ask the questions.

It's no stretch to connect the Holocaust to the ongoing Palestinian terror attacks in Israel. Just as the Nazis' ultimate aim was to rid Europe of Jews, the goal of Palestinian terror groups, aided and abetted by some political leaders as well as terror-sponsoring governments in the region, is to purge the Middle East of the Jewish state. Much has changed in the 70 years since the end of the Shoah, most significantly Israel's ability to defend its citizens, but the existential danger remains.

Accordingly, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is more than justified in linking the Holocaust to Palestinian terror. But his comments last week to the effect that Hitler had no intention of exterminating the Jews until Haj Amin al-Husseini, the grand mufti of Jerusalem, convinced him to implement the Final Solution, are categorically false. No less than the chief historian of Yad Vashem has said that the version of events described by Netanyahu is simply "not true."

There is more than enough misinformation out there for anti-Semites and terrorists to seize upon. Jewish leaders should do their best to clarify our history, not muddle it. ■ — YONI

Reflections

The benefits of reunification

Stuart Lewis

"The past," wrote William Faulkner, "is never dead. It's not even past."

Nov 9 marks the 26th anniversary of an event that seemed to most of the world at that time beyond improbable: the relatively abrupt fall of the Berlin Wall and, a year later, the reunification of East and West Germany.

I think a lot about the fall of the Berlin Wall. I am not German nor did I have family from there. I am a Jew, born in the United Kingdom and raised in Canada. And as improbable as those events were in the course of history, I have my own improbable story – linked to that Wall.

In June 1983, I was backpacking my way through Europe. I began the year working on a kibbutz for several months before my European arrival. Having been a political science major, the possibility of visiting East Berlin exerted a gravitational pull on me that was irresistible. Curiosity came into play as well. Growing up in Toronto's Bathurst Manor meant having friends whose parents were Holocaust survivors. None in our family were. Still, I developed a poisonous aversion to all things German. Years later I would refuse to allow my fiancé to consider registering for German-made cutlery. (I lost that battle.)

East Berlin was exactly as one would expect having read a John Le Carré novel. Crossing through Checkpoint Charlie with a couple of Americans, the world of colour suddenly seemed to turn to black and white. Nothing much had changed since World War II. I could still make out the strafing marks of artillery on the grey walls of many buildings I walked past.

We stopped at a small cafe and invited a couple of East Berliners our age to join us. They showed us around, and we talked about life behind the Iron Curtain. At the end of our day I suggested to my new Communist friend that we keep in touch. We exchanged addresses. A few months later and back in Israel, I received my first letter from Frank.

By the end of 1983, I returned to Toronto and Frank and I continued writing to each other. We talked about politics mostly, but our lives crept into the dialogue, too. Frank was absurdly worldly compared to me. He was intellectual and read widely. He played the saxophone and was addicted to American jazz. He loved everything from philosophy to movies. I confessed to him that he was the first German I knew. He confessed that I was the first Jew he had ever met.

But there was a question lodged in the back of my mind from the day I met him: "Frank, what did your father do in the war?" It took me almost three decades to finally ask him that question. It was that question and the test in the knowing that would be an indirect catalyst to my own reunification.

For 40 years, my father and I had been living on either side of our own Berlin Wall. A big-talking, charming, slap-on-the-back salesman, he was always "this close" to the Big Score. One day he never returned from a business trip to the Far East and our family now three of us (mom, myself and younger brother) was abandoned. Seven years later I found out he had a new family. I hated him.

In September of 2014, my father and I made one last attempt at reconciliation. I was tired of the hating, of the grip that my hate for him had on me. Being with him was at first awkward and uncomfortable. I refused to call him "Dad," but we were making progress. Then in late December 2014 I found out that he had been hospitalized. The weeks passed and his condition continued to decline.

Stuart Lewis's father

> We made a choice and the wall between us came down.

"I want to show you something," said his third wife. It was a green military beret. "It belongs to your father."

I said I had no idea what she was talking about. She gave me a puzzled look. "Stuart, has your father not told you what he did in the war?"

"No. What war?"

In one of his letters, Frank said that while the benefits of reunification were undeniable, for many East Germans the sudden and powerful inrushing of new freedoms and opportunities created a kind of anxiety. We fear what we do not know.

I was afraid of what I might come to know of my father. I was afraid that I might lose the moral clarity of seeing the world we shared as black and white.

It became clear that he was going to die. It would only be a matter of time. In the days that followed we talked in great detail about his experiences in the Korean War. I often sat on the edge of the bed beside him. He had been a member of an elite squad of Royal Marine commandos. I realized my father was someone I knew in an extremely limited way. In that role as father and husband I remembered him as an unmitigated disaster. But as a soldier my father had been a success. He revealed horrific and gruesome battle stories to me. I now know I am here because of his heroic actions.

He died on Feb. 11.

I am not ready to forgive my father particularly for abandoning my mother. But I no longer hate him. I understand that his life might have been more complicated than I was willing to allow. Maybe it's because I was afraid of what I might find. It can be easier standing on one side of the wall talking about "them" while we comfort ourselves on our side talking about "us."

At the end of the day, however, there is no "us" and "them." Only "us." Faulkner was right – up to a point. The past is never past. It will always be with us. He was wrong, however, to pretend that the past determines our future.

The ultimate lesson I learned at the Berlin Wall is that our biases and prejudices, our habits and predispositions – are not chosen for us. We choose them.

I never believed I could ever reunite with my estranged father. The hate was too real. I thought it was too late. But we made a choice and the wall between us came down. The past is a kind of wall. ■

A changing of the guard in Ottawa

What can Canadian Jews expect from Justin Trudeau? And how will the community remember Stephen Harper? SHERI SHEFA reports

When the votes in last week's election were counted and it became clear the Tories – unapologetically pro-Israel and economically conservative – would be replaced by a Liberal government, many in the Jewish community who were supporters of outgoing Prime Minister Stephen Harper took to social media to express fears about what Canada will look like under Justin Trudeau's leadership.

But according to Jewish community leaders and scholars, there's no reason to think Trudeau won't be supportive of Israel and Jews.

"I think it's foolish to doubt that Mr Trudeau will be anything but a friend of Israel," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies. "I think he will continue to foster a close diplomatic relationship with Israel, as he has given no indication of doing otherwise. I do feel, however, that it is unlikely that he will be as consistent and intense in his support of Israel as his predecessor."

For those who revered outgoing Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his principled stance on the Israeli-Arab conflict and for his support of the Jewish community, the Oct. 19 election was a sad day in Canadian history.

Following three consecutive election victories in 2006, 2008 and 2011 – the first time a Conservative party had accomplished this in more than 50 years – Justin Trudeau's Liberals succeeded in winning a majority government, ending Harper's decade-long run as Canada's leader.

For better or worse, Harper's legacy, in part, will be framed by his unwavering support of Israel and the Jews, and he'll be remembered by many in the Jewish community as the best friend Israel ever had.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies, said Harper's support of Israel and Canada's Jewish community was more than symbolic.

"I think Mr. Harper's outspoken support of Israel benefited the Jewish state and the Jewish community in a substantial way. This support was perhaps no more tangible than when he withdrew financial support for pro-Palestinian NGOs, including the Canadian Arab Federation, Kairos and Palestine House, because he felt these organizations were perpetuating domestic and international anti-Semitism," Benlolo said.

"Most relevant to the Jewish community here in Canada was Mr. Harper's signing of the Ottawa Protocol to Combat Anti-Semitism. The protocol was a historic declaration that hatred will not be tolerated in Canada. It also set out an action plan for supporting initiatives to combat anti-Semitism and provided a framework for other nations to follow."

Shimon Fogel, CEO and president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, agreed that Harper's support for Israel was significant.

"Beyond the advances in the bilateral relationship – and there were many, including, military and intelligence co-operation, trade, innovation and technology, health care, agriculture, cyber security and the like – the role played by Canada in the diplomatic arena was vital for Israel," Fogel said.

Nelson Wiseman, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said although all Canadian parties are supportive of Israel, "obviously, he was the most outspoken of all the prime ministers we've had... The difference is that Harper was the most forward in his rhetoric, and that was acknowledged in Israel."

In 2014, Harper became the first Canadian prime minister to address the Knesset, and later that year, he was given an honorary degree from Tel Aviv University.

Stephen Harper

Wiseman said Harper also brought an unprecedented number of Jews into the Conservative party, both as contributors and as voters.

Myer Siemiatycki, a professor of politics and public administration at Ryerson University, said Harper's legacy, as it relates to Israel and Canadian Jews, "will be highly polarized."

"There will be, in the Jewish community, a sentiment among some that he was the greatest friend to Israel and world Jewry that Canada has ever produced, and there will be others who believe that his role was not a constructive one for Israel and that maybe even the whole enterprise of his approach to Israel had more to do with what Israel and the Jews could do for Harper than what he could do for Israel and the Jews," Siemiatycki said.

He added that he doesn't want to minimize the significance of Harper's consistent affirmations that pro-Israel Jews were not alone in their concern for the well-being of Israel.

"But the bigger question, in a way, is did that support tangibly produce benefits for Israel and would a different approach to Israel and the Palestinians and the Middle East yield more benefits? I have no doubt that for some Jews, Harper represented, and was, a feel-good ally, but did it go beyond that? I think that's debatable."

Bar and bat mitzvah projects not just about money

Mira Sucharov

It's a bat mitzvah year in our family. We've booked the photographer, the caterer, the DJ and the invitation company. Our daughter is studying her parshah and learning to chant the Haftorah and Maftir.

Now it's time to inject some social justice into the experience, in the form of what have come to be known as "mitzvah projects." Coming of age in the 1980s, my generation was less social justice-oriented than today's. So what exactly, I wondered, should a "mitzvah project" entail?

I turned to JEDLAB – the Jewish educators' forum on Facebook – to get oriented. I discovered that there is an organization expressly founded to support kids in their mitzvah project strategies. Called Areyvut (Hebrew for "social responsibility"), the New-Jersey-based group offers consulting services – from a free phone consultation to more extensive, fee-based ones – and direct organizing of an array of hands-on, direct-action-style activities that party guests can participate in.

Called "chesed fairs," these might include game-board painting for a social-services agency, hat-making for cancer fighters, or cupcake-decorating for a local day centre. Clients need not live in the area – or even in the United States.

Elsewhere, Areyvut teams up with synagogues and youth groups to teach kids to be "mitzvah clowns" for residents of long-term care facilities.

I decided to take up Areyvut's offer to engage in a free phone consultation on my daughter's mitzvah project idea. She has chosen a complex topic – addressing the economic effects, particularly around access to housing, of urban gentrification. Talking to Areyvut's staff reminded me that mitzvah projects need not be confined to financial giving. Advocacy and awareness can be just as important.

I decided to take some of these ideas to my own community. Through word of mouth I initiated a b'nai mitzvah club to help develop mitzvah project ideas. At the first meeting – which we called "Hot Chocolate for Hot Issues," I led a workshop to get the kids thinking about a given issue, how to identify deeper causes of the problem and how to consider the range of action one might take to address these problems.

For our mitzvah club this year, each child will identify a pressing issue around which he or she is passionate and then develop an action plan, a plan that should involve at least two of the following: fundraising, political advocacy, public awareness and direct action. Fundraising could involve donating a portion of bar or bat mitzvah gift money, or holding a bakeathon or danceathon. Political advocacy might involve letter-writing to elected officials. Public awareness could include an Instagram campaign increasing public understanding of the issue. And direct action means identifying a relevant organization at which the child can volunteer.

Sometimes there is an identified need, but not an established organization dedicated to it. In these cases, Areyvut can support kids in being more ambitious – for example in creating their own non-profit organization. Billy's Baseballs grew out of a bar mitzvah initiative where a child organized the sending of decorated baseballs to soldiers stationed abroad.

Daniel Rothner, Areyvut's founder and director, puts it this way. As Jews, we are supposed to be a "light unto the nations," engaged in making the world a better place, he told me. And the impact extends beyond the Jewish community, he added. He is also passionate about getting kids to think about the deeper causes. What of Dave, the homeless man who appears at the soup kitchen every week? Why does Dave need to come week after week?

Our own b'nai mitzvah club has come a long way from kids reciting the "today I am a fountain pen" joke. As my daughter said, the bar or bat mitzvah milestone means that "technically you're becoming a woman or a man, and once you are [an adult] you have a responsibility to help out with the issues in the world and in our community." ■

Rabin's hope remains realized, to the Palestinians' shame

Mordechai Ben-Dat

In the late evening of Nov. 4, 1995, Israel's prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was gunned down in Tel Aviv. He was shot and killed by Yigal Amir, a young Israeli who had substituted violence for faith and rage for reason. Amir abused the name of God when he invoked it to murder another human being.

Twenty years have passed since that shocking, melancholy, distressing night. The 20th yahrzeit of that ghastly act was commemorated last week on the 12th day of Cheshvan.

Rabin was assassinated because his murderer objected to the prime minister's commitment to cede land to the Palestinians as enshrined in the Declarations of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements (also known as the Oslo accords), signed on the White House lawn on Sept. 13, 1993.

Indeed, there were many others – in Israel and elsewhere – who, for varied reasons, warned against and objected to the signing of the Oslo accords. Rabin acknowledged the significant risks, but decided to seize what he believed was a truly historic opportunity.

Unfortunately, subsequent years have proven the failure of the accords. Rather than partners for peace, Palestinian leaders turned out to be prevaricators. The promises they made were false. The legal commitments they signed were ignored. The solemn utterances to audiences in Washington or Oslo about their embrace of non-violence were untrue.

When Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat walked away from negotiations with Israel at Camp David, some seven years after that hopeful handshake on the White House lawn, he knew that then-U.S. president Bill Clinton was alert to the Palestinian leader's duplicity. To provide a pretext for abjuring the resumption of talks with Israel, Arafat launched the suicide bombing intifadah in September 2000 in which so many men, women and children died violently.

Despite the ultimate failure of the Oslo accords, Rabin was correct to attempt to find a breakthrough with the Palestinian leaders. Not to have done so, he believed, would have betrayed the sanctity of the numerous prayers for peace that inspire the collective yearning of the Jewish People.

On Oct. 5, 1995, merely one month before he was killed, Rabin's final words to the Knesset on the ratification of the Oslo peace accords demonstrated that his vision of coexistence with the Palestinians was neither naïve nor delusional. While hopeful of securing a final agreement, he was clearly aware of possible pitfalls along the way.

"We view the permanent solution in the framework of the State of Israel, which will include most of the area of the Land of Israel as it was under the rule of the British Mandate, and alongside it a Palestinian entity, which will be a home to most of the Palestinian residents living in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

"We would like this to be an entity which is less than a state and which will independently run the lives of the Palestinians under its authority. The borders of the State of Israel, during the permanent solution, will be beyond the lines which existed before the Six Day War. We will not return to the June 4, 1967 lines.

"Today we may be opening a new stage in the annals of the Jewish People and the State of Israel. We know the chances. We know the risks. We will do our best to expand the chances and reduce the risks.

"We appeal to Jews and Palestinians alike to act with restraint, to preserve human dignity, to behave in a fitting manner – and to live in peace and security. We are embarking upon a new path which could lead us to an era of peace, to the end of wars.

"That is our prayer. That is our hope."

That Rabin's hope was not realized resounds to the everlasting shame and disgrace of the Palestinian leaders. To this day, they extol victimhood, preach hatred and counsel the destruction of the Jewish state rather than the building of their own Palestinian state. And so, they continue to betray their own people and condemn them to statelessness.

What a tragedy. ■

Post-election musings on the mitzvah of public service

Rabbi Jay Kelman

When the Jewish People were first exiled from their land in the year 586 BCE, the prophet Jeremiah exhorted them to follow the laws of the land in which they found themselves. While we yearned to return to the Land of Israel, we were to see ourselves as loyal citizens of our countries of residence. Jewish law demands that we say a prayer for the welfare of the government, including those who were very far from democratic. How much more so must we who live in the wonderful country of Canada.

I pen these thoughts the day after the Canadian people elected a new, and likely a very different, government.

How blessed we are that leaders change without bloodshed and people can vote for change if they are so inclined. We must as loyal citizens and loyal Jews pray that the government be blessed with much success in its mandate to serve the country as best it can.

There is no greater calling in the Jewish tradition than public service. Serving in government is potentially one of the highest forms of public service. The ability to help so many, without fanfare or fame is almost unparalleled. While politics is often rough and brings out the negative all too often, many, and likely most, of these same politicians aim to, and are often very successful at, helping many people away from the limelight.

Political life can be gruelling – the divorce rate among politicians is much too high. Almost all of our elected officials could be earning much more in the private sector, and despite the often public outcry over their high salaries and generous pensions, it's the rare politician who enters public life to get ahead financially.

Most do it because they sincerely want to help people and strongly believe the best way to do so is through public office. There is little doubt that the political system often doesn't allow these high aspirations to be met, and we all suffer for that.

Our tradition teaches that the most important trait needed by those who want to serve the public is to be "motivated for the sake of heaven," to help others as best they can. While it's always good to be properly motivated, we generally place little importance on why we do what we do. Judaism primarily focuses on what we do, not why we do it.

Those who give lots of charity in order to get lots of honour are deserving of exactly that. Doing right is what matters, not why we do what's right – proper motivation is an added bonus when it occurs.

However, by definition, public service is different. Public service means balancing competing needs, each in its own right worthy of support, but in the aggregate, it's impossible to provide for all who need. One can debate whether it's wise to incur deficit spending (something that, if promises are kept, is on its way), but even those who support such spending are left billions of dollars short of doing all they want to do.

Decisions have to be made, and those decisions will inevitably benefit some and hurt others. If we increase spending on health care, we must cut somewhere else, such as education. Every dollar spent in one area is a dollar that could have been spent somewhere else. These decisions must be made with only one goal in mind – what is in the public interest.

Vigorous debate about what's best is healthy, but choices must be made. To "hurt" some because you're helping others is the price we must be willing to pay to enter public service. Doing such is a great mitzvah. But to promote policy or vote in a particular way because of some personal calculation – such as getting re-elected – means you'll be held personally responsible for the pain caused to others. Public service really isn't for everyone. ■

We must speak out for Israel

Norma Baumel Joseph

I cannot get the image out of my head.

Not the one of the child dead on the shore, nor the one of the tearful mother at her son's grave. No – none of those terrifies me.

But that knife held aloft in the hands of shouting Palestinians, that large knife with a deeply grooved edge and a knuckle-duster handle. I visualize that knife entering a human body, silencing a voice, ending a life. That is terrifying.

How in the world did we reach such a frightening point in our history? Surely someone out there knows we collectively have suffered enough. Isn't it time we were left in peace?

Our story could easily be one of richness and great achievements. After all, we do have a state and a place for all Jews. And that state has many accomplishments to boast of. Talk of all the Nobel laureates or the economic gains, the Internet revolution and the medical discoveries. Even more astounding is the fact that Israel has just about solved the world's water problems. There is so much to be proud of, so much to lay claim to.

But what do we hear? Not praise, but moral indignation from foolish or hateful sources. The world seems to have a blind spot when it comes to Israel and the Jews. No one seems to feel the pain of the Israeli Jew who fears to take a bus ride or go for coffee, or is afraid of losing a son. Instead, they only hear misinformed or dis-informed tales that they immediately believe. Why?

Why doesn't the world care that my nieces and nephews are in danger, that my beloved sister-in-law is afraid to leave her house. My daughter-in-law called to tell me her friend was hysterical – as in emotional instability caused by trauma – because there was no more pepper spray to buy. How can people live in such a state of panic? The truth is they cannot.

My grandson saw a video clip of news from Israel in his school. He immediately texted his dad: "Are all the Jews in Israel going to die?" Dad emailed back,

> The world seems to have a blind spot when it comes to Israel and the Jews

"Not to worry. We have a state and an army. They will protect us." But no one can be protected from these random acts of murder. It is this randomness that so infuriates and terrifies. Added to all that is the fact that no one seems able or willing to do something about it. I don't know what – but something.

We cannot live in silence now. Maybe it is our task to get the word out about Israel. Perhaps it is our mission to tell all about her marvelous accomplishments, to remind everyone that there may be errors and even human rights violations, but Israel is not focused on destroying a people. Israel is not genocidal. It is not declaring the death of all Palestinians, nor will it allow the death of all Israelis.

There are solutions to accommodate both peoples in this vast territory called the Middle East. We, who for whatever reasons don't live in Israel, must join the battle somehow. We can be the mouthpieces for our families in Israel. We can talk to the world.

In the face of our friends' and neighbours' disdain or disbelief, we must persist in telling the truth about Israel. I do not mean that we must be defensive or apologetic. Rather, the truth can be shared even in the face of our neighbours' lack of trust or the media's open biases. Even if it is uncomfortable, we can be Israel's voice to the world. Moral indignation is ours now.

For too long they have spoken only ill of Israel, for too long they have believed only the bad. Now it is our job to set the record straight. Speak up and share the responsibility for Israel's survival. ■

Jewish candidates: Who won and who lost?

jshupac@thecjn.ca

There were three Jewish MPs before the Oct. 19 election, but by the end of the next day, there were six, all of them Liberal and all of them new to the House of Commons.

Canada's first-ever Jewish finance minister, Joe Oliver, was defeated in his Toronto riding, as was Tory MP Mark Adler, while Irwin Cotler didn't seek re-election in Mount Royal.

Beating Adler in York Centre was Liberal Michael Levitt, while Cote St. Luc Mayor Anthony Housefather bested Tory Robert Libman in Mount Royal, Liberal Jim Carr prevailed over Conservative MP Joyce Bateman in Winnipeg South Centre, Karina Gould in Burlington, Julie Dabrusin in Toronto-Danforth and in Quebec's Laurentides–Labelle riding, David Graham took the seat for the Liberals.

With 20,282 votes (32 per cent), Graham defeated Bloc Québécois candidate Johanne Régimbald (18,807, 30 per cent) and NDPer Simon-Pierre Landry (16,624, 26 per cent). NDP MP Marc-André Morin had held the riding since 2011, but he lost the nomination to Landry.

"I very much appreciate the support of the voters of the riding where I grew up," Graham told The CJN. "I worked very hard, knocking on thousands of doors and attending hundreds of events across the riding, which, at 19,634 square km is almost identical in territory to Israel (20,770 square km). I believe the Laurentians were ready for a real change, and I am proud to be delivering it for my community."

It was first time running for political office for Graham, whose is Jewish from his mother's side. His grandparents were Beno Eskenazi, a Sephardi immigrant from Istanbul and a successful Montreal civil engineer, and Goldie Wolofsky, granddaughter of Kanader Adler newspaper founder Hirsch Wolofsky. His father's family is a mix of Catholic and Protestant.

Meanwhile, in an upset, Julie Dabrusin beat NDP incumbent Craig Scott in former NDP leader Jack Layton's riding of Toronto-Danforth by a 1,200-vote margin.

Oliver lost the hotly contested riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, which he'd held since 2011, when he beat incumbent Liberal cabinet minister Joe Volpe. Jews comprise just under a quarter of the riding.

With 39 per cent of the votes, Oliver was defeated by Liberal candidate and lawyer Marco Mendicino, who won 50 per cent.

They were trailed by former Saskatchewan NDP finance minister Andrew Thomson, who garnered six per cent.

In Toronto's York Centre, where three Jews went head to head as the top contenders, Levitt won the historically Liberal riding back for his party, beating the incumbent Adler, who served one term and garnered attention during the election campaign for (falsely) claiming in some of his campaign signage to be the first-ever MP who was the child of a Holocaust survivor.

The race was close, with Levitt grabbing 47 per cent of the vote and Adler getting 44 per cent. Palliative care doctor Hal Berman came in third for the NDP, with seven per cent.

Michael Levitt

In Montreal's high-profile Mount Royal, a Liberal riding for 75 years that the Tories had hoped to capture after whittling away at Cotler's margin of victory over the past two elections, Housefather won handily with about 50 per cent of the vote, to Libman's 38 per cent.

In Burlington, Gould, 28, beat three-term Conservative MP Mike Wallace, garnering 32,228 votes (46 per cent) to his 29,778 (42.5 per cent).

In Toronto-St. Paul's, which is also home to many Jews, longtime Liberal incumbent Carolyn Bennett won by a landslide, followed by Conservative Marnie MacDougall. First-time candidate Noah Richler, son of famous Jewish novelist Mordecai Richler, came third for the NDP.

In Thornhill, NDP candidate Lorne Cherry lost to incumbent Tory MP Peter Kent, who held onto the riding easily.

Out west, in British Columbia, first-time NDP candidate Mira Oreck, formerly Pacific region director of Canadian Jewish Congress and current director of public engagement at the Broadbent Institute, was defeated in the newly created riding of Vancouver-Granville.

Despite the fact Leadnow, a group advocating for strategic voting among Liberal and NDP supporters, endorsed Oreck, she came in third with 10,394 votes, losing to Liberal Jody Wilson-Raybould, former regional chief of the Assembly of First Nations, and trailing Conservative Erinn Broshko, a corporate lawyer and businessman.

As expected, NDP leader Tom Mulcair beat Liberal candidate and lawyer Rachel Bendayan in the Montreal riding of Outremont, but the race was surprisingly close, with Bendayan getting 34 per cent of the votes to Mulcair's 44 per cent.

In Alberta, former MLA, city councillor and 2013 mayoral candidate Karen Leibovici lost for the Liberals in the re-formed riding of Edmonton West, which historically had gone back and forth between the Liberals and the Tories, and was last held by former Liberal cabinet minister Anne McLellan. It was won by Tory Kelly McCauley.

In Winnipeg South Centre, Liberal Jim Carr, a former newspaper columnist and president of the Manitoba Business Council, as well as a vocal supporter of Israel, defeated Tory incumbent Joyce Bateman.

In Ontario, Tory Yonatan Rozenszajn, a 31-year-old lawyer who immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1999, came a distant third in Hamilton Centre, with almost 6,000 votes. Incumbent and former provincial cabinet minister David Christopherson won the riding for the NDP. Liberal Anne Tennier came second, with close to 14,000 votes. ■

Jewish groups extend warm congratulations to Trudeau

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Jewish community groups say they hope to establish a positive relationship with Justin Trudeau's new Liberal government.

After winning a majority with 184 seats, Trudeau, speaking at a victory rally in Montreal on election night, promised to "be the prime minister of all Canadians."

David J. Cape, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), thanked outgoing Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his leadership and support of Israel, but congratulated Trudeau on his definitive win.

"We are grateful for the positions Mr. Trudeau and his party have taken on a number of issues, including support for hate crimes legislation; sanctions against Iran; a range of social justice challenges; and a close Canada-Israel relationship – to name only a few," Cape said. "We look forward to working with Prime Minister-elect Trudeau and his cabinet, along with the opposition parties, on the range of public policy issues of importance to the Jewish community and indeed all Canadians."

Michael Mostyn, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada also congratulated Trudeau. "As the voice of grassroots Canadian Jewry, we look forward to working with the new government on issues of importance to the Jewish community. Our 2015 IMPACT Survey identified many of the community's top issues and will inform the advocacy agenda that B'nai Brith will bring forward to Canada's new government," he said. "At the same time, we want to thank outgoing Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his service to Canada which was characterized by his long-standing commitment to the safety and security of Canadians and his principled support of the democratic State of Israel both in Canada and at international fora."

Ispace Canada, a "progressive pro-peace organization," said the election showed you "can't stereotype or pigeonhole the Jewish community. The results in the five ridings with large numbers of Jewish voters showed that there is a return to the progressive orientation of Jews in Canada. In the 2011 election, 52 per cent of the Jewish community supported the Conservatives. This time there was a definitive shift," they said.

"Of course Israel remains a serious consideration for Jews in Canada, but as The Canadian Jewish News demonstrated in a pre-election article, the policies concerned with Israel and the Middle East are almost identical in all three major parties. However, only one party used Israel as a wedge issue, creating a rift in the community.

David Cape

"This election has created somewhat of a dilemma for the organized Jewish community. Some groups have put all their political capital behind the Conservative party. Now they will have to figure out how to represent the diversity of Jewish opinion to the newly elected government."

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) president and CEO Avi Benlolo released a statement congratulating the 43-year-old Trudeau.

"FSWC looks forward to working with Mr. Trudeau and the Liberal party as we continue our efforts to promote tolerance education and eradicate hate and anti-Semitism in Canadian society," Benlolo said.

"I am eager to speak with Mr. Trudeau and Liberal MPs in the coming months about how we can best work together to achieve these common goals," he said, adding that he is grateful for Harper's "relentless effort over this past decade to combat anti-Semitism, promote Holocaust education and defend the State of Israel. We have every confidence that Mr. Trudeau will continue this important effort."

Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs, an Israel advocacy group, said although her organization is apolitical, she hopes for continued support for Israel from the government. "We've enjoyed a very enviable relationship between Israel and our government leaders in Canada, and I would hope that that relationship will continue with the newly elected government."

Mark Waldman, executive director of the non-partisan Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), also congratulated Trudeau. "We look forward to building on the solid foundation that he has built with our community over the past few years. We thank Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his steadfast support of our community and the issues that we hold dear. We would also like to express our appreciation to [NDP Leader] Tom Mulcair for his support and friendship." ■

Losing Harper will not be an easy pill to swallow

Michael Diamond

More than a decade ago, I asked a number of senior Conservatives why they were prepared to take such a strong stand on Israel. Would that not weaken the party and make it less likely to win an election? The answer I received was simple: we will do it because it is the right thing to do, and Canadians will "get it."

The Conservative party did just that, and Canadians did get it.

Many of us were truly saddened on election night. We were saddened because Stephen Harper led a government that, more than any other, was prepared to take strong stands in support of western values, and of Israel. Harper and the Conservative party raised the bar in Canada in many ways, including the importance of supporting the only democracy in the Middle East in unequivocal terms. Losing Harper's leadership in this area will not be an easy pill to swallow.

Now, Justin Trudeau is set to become Canada's next prime minister. He was not my choice, but he is Canada's choice, and he has won the respect that the position deserves, including from those who did not support him. I believe it is our job not to undermine him and his party, but to carry on in good faith and assume that the assurances and commitments made during the election will be kept.

Trudeau talks about a Canada for all Canadians. How he interprets that, given the diversity of our country's population, will be the challenge.

When Palestinians knife Jews in Israel, how will he handle the controversy? Will he rise to the level of Harper in declaring clearly that Canada stands with Israel in its attempts to repel the terrorists? Will he suggest there is moral equivalency between the positions of the Palestinians and the Israeli Jews, between the attackers and the attacked? Or will he just stay quiet on the subject?

Israel could, until today, count on Canada's prime minister, or one of his senior staff, for support – not military support, but the support of words of truth. It's the kind of support that matters to Israelis who feel alone in the world, and that allows other world leaders to take more supportive stands on Israel. Perhaps Israel still can turn to Canada's next prime minister.

> He was not my choice, but he is Canada's choice.

Throughout the campaign, people like myself raised serious concerns about the willingness of Trudeau to be as supportive of Israel as Harper had been. Yet, privately and publicly, the Jewish community was treated to assurances that there was no daylight between the Liberals and Conservatives on the question of support for Israel. Many in our community believed these words, and many traditional Liberals who had moved into the Conservative fold returned to vote Liberal, believing that Trudeau would be for Israel what Harper had been. That was their choice to make, and they made it.

The core message of the Liberals was that it's time for change. The question now is what form that change will take, and whether we as Canadians, and as members of the Jewish community of Canada, will benefit from those changes.

Being an optimist by nature, I am prepared to wait and see, and trust in what I have been told by prominent and not-so-prominent Liberals alike – that Trudeau would be a friend of Israel and of the Jewish community.

Democracy may not be perfect, but it's the best political system available, and in our willingness to accept the outcome, and not prejudge, we strengthen that system and our country. Make no mistake: I, like many, will be watching carefully and am willing to be critical if and when appropriate. But I will be positive, too, where positives are due. That's the democratic way. ■

After the election, a new day for the Jewish community

Benjamin Shinewald

The Canadian Jewish community has been largely disconnected from reality these past 10 years. The Liberals' stunning electoral victory offers us a precious chance to reconcile with ourselves, and with that reality.

The Conservatives' muscular pro-Israel rhetoric has long resonated with many Canadian Jews and brought them into Stephen Harper's political base. This is perfectly fine, of course, but what is worrying is that the silencing of disagreements and control of messaging have percolated into our communal life.

You would think that a community that virtually invented the concept of dissent would have celebrated our differences and fostered a deep sense of mutual respect across party lines. Instead, at some point in the last decade, a clear sense began to emerge that the Conservatives were the only "legitimate" choice for Canada's Jews.

Jewish fundraising organizations tripped over themselves to bestow all manner of awards on Harper and other Conservative stalwarts, such as Jason Kenney, while prominent Jewish advocacy organizations shifted evermore right, blurring the line between communal interests and partisanship. Little by little, communal dissent dissipated. Mutual respect fell into short supply.

All this pushed Jewish Liberals back on their heels, their Jewish and Zionist bona fides sometimes even called into question. Some Jewish Liberals became almost apologetic and timid in the face of their Conservative co-religionists.

That reality began to change with the 2013 election of Justin Trudeau as the Liberal party's leader. Jews increasingly saw a leader who supported Israel just as robustly as Stephen Harper. A key moment happened in the campaign during the Munk Foreign Policy Debate, during which Trudeau asserted: "The issue of Israel where we most disagree as Liberals with Mr. Harper is that he has made support for Israel a domestic political football, when all three of us support Israel and any Canadian government will."

In failing to refute Trudeau's assertion, Harper effectively communicated that the Liberal party really did, in fact, have Israel's back. In one fell swoop, Trudeau neutralized 10 years of wedge politics, and Jews began paying greater attention to the Liberal leader and to the other issues at play in the campaign.

Those issues resonated strongly with many of us, although Conservative strategists continued to mistakenly believe that Jewish voters were single-issue voters. Instead, from the economy to the niqab, from Rob Ford to refugees, Jews increasingly found themselves questioning the Conservatives' judgment and bristling at their tone.

It is telling that two of the three Jews elected in 2011 were Conservatives, whereas the six Jews elected in 2015 are all Liberals. More telling still is that every "Jewish riding" in Canada save one went Liberal red, while Canada's most senior Jewish parliamentarian, Joe Oliver, lost his seat to Marco Mendicino, a Liberal newcomer who expressed his support for our community unambiguously, but also inclusively.

Today, with change so clearly in the air across Canada, we should all seize the opportunity enthusiastically to welcome its breezes into our Jewish community, too. To earn the trust of our community's grassroots, Jewish advocacy organizations should acknowledge the problems of the past and embrace real dissent. To earn the trust of our new government, they must commit to a truly non-partisan future.

Jewish Liberals, meanwhile, should avoid any temptation to settle scores with their Conservative counterparts. Instead, they should reach out to Jewish Conservatives in a spirit of unity and collaboration.

No matter which party you voted for, all of us in the Jewish community should recommit to the deeply Jewish concept of derech eretz, long absent from our communal debate, but central to who we are at our core. ■

Benjamin Shinewald lives in Toronto and serves on a variety of Jewish communal boards.

Jim Carr reclaims Winnipeg South Centre for Liberals

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Jim Carr says he's ready.

Carr, a third-generation Winnipegger who often notes that his Russian Jewish grandparents came to Canada a century ago, took almost 60 per cent of the vote in Winnipeg South Centre Oct. 19, handily defeating incumbent Tory MP Joyce Bateman, who received about 30 per cent.

"The people of Canada have said that they are ready for change, the voters in Winnipeg South Centre have said that they are ready for change and I am ready to be the MP for Winnipeg South Centre," he said in his victory speech.

"What a victory this has been for Justin Trudeau and the Liberal party! The map of Canada is red, red, red! In just a few short years, Justin Trudeau has led us back from the wilderness to form a majority government, and he did it with a positive message of hope."

He said that under Trudeau's leadership, he's looking forward to the restoration of civil discourse and he predicted the new prime minister will re-institute regular meetings with the premiers.

Carr was a strong contender for the seat. He began his professional life as a musician, playing oboe for the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra before leaving for McGill University. Since returning to Winnipeg, Carr has worn many high-profile hats, among them being a lone Liberal member of the Manitoba legislature, editorial writer and columnist for the Winnipeg Free Press, spokesperson for the University of Winnipeg, and president and CEO of the Business Council of Manitoba.

In 2011, Carr was awarded the Order of Manitoba, the province's highest honour for his contributions to his home community.

Coming from the West as one of three Jews in the Liberal caucus (as well as all of Parliament), and considering his credentials, Carr could be in line for a cabinet post in the new government. A reporter asked him if he expects that, and he responded that he harbours no such expectation. "My goal was to be elected the member of Parliament for Winnipeg South Centre," he said. "My focus will be serving my constituents."

In his victory speech, he also thanked his team of 400 volunteers, singling out one in particular – 85-year-old Janice Kaminsky – who, Carr said, put up 800 campaign signs during the campaign.

Carr said Winnipeg South Centre is a microcosm of Canada.

"Going door to door over the past two years, I have met people from all over the world – people like my grandparents who came here from Russia over 100 years ago, seeking a better life – and I have heard all of their stories. We are a generous nation with tolerance for all."

In recapturing Winnipeg South Centre, he has restored the Liberal brand to a constituency that had traditionally voted Liberal since its reconstitution in 1988. The riding – home to about 70 per cent of Winnipeg's Jewish population – was represented by former Liberal cabinet minister Lloyd Axworthy from 1988 to 2000.

Axworthy was foreign minister under former prime minister Jean Chrétien and later served as president and vice-chancellor of the University of Winnipeg.

Axworthy was succeeded by Anita Neville (who, like Carr, is Jewish). She served from 2000 to 2011 and was edged out in her bid for re-election by Bateman who won the seat by less than 1,000 votes.

In his remarks, Carr said Bateman called him and graciously conceded defeat. ■

Liberals hold on to Mount Royal

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

In one of the most-watched races in the country, particularly for the Jewish community, Mount Royal was the riding the Conservatives had pinned their hopes on for making a breakthrough in Montreal.

But in the end, it wasn't even close.

Liberal Anthony Housefather decisively defeated Conservative Robert Libman maintaining a 75-history of Liberal hegemony in Mount Royal, the riding held by outgoing MP Irwin Cotler.

The other big story of the night was the strong showing by Liberal Rachel Bendayan against New Democratic leader Tom Mulcair in Outremont.

At just after 11 p.m. with half of the vote in his favour, Housefather delivered his victory speech to the jubilant crowd gathered at his Van Horne Avenue campaign office.

"Everyone tells me I have very large footsteps to follow: Pierre Trudeau, Sheila Finestone and Irwin Cotler for the past 16 years," said Housefather, referring to the last three MPs for Mount Royal. "I feel very lucky that Irwin will be around to advise me in the coming years."

Housefather, 45, mayor of Côte St. Luc for the past 10 years and a corporate lawyer, vowed to represent every constituent in this culturally diverse riding. With Jewish voters representing about one-third of the population, the remainder is made up of a wide spectrum of ethnic and religious groups – many of whom clearly backed Housefather.

"I have to represent all people in Mount Royal, and stand up for their rights as Canadians and, of course, human rights across the world... I hope to fulfil your faith in me, and I promise to work hard every single day to do just that."

Early returns indicated that Conservative took a majority of the polls in Côte St. Luc and Hampstead, where the Jewish population is concentrated, while the Liberals were leading by a wide margin elsewhere, in Côte des Neiges and Town of Mount Royal.

According to Elections Canada, the final tally was Housefather 50 per cent (more than 24,000 votes), Libman 38 per cent (more than 18,000 votes), and the NDP's Mario Jacinto Rimbao eight per cent. Twenty per cent of ballots were cast in advance polls.

"Eighteen thousand votes was the magic number we thought we needed to win – that's more than 2,000 votes than Irwin Cotler got when he won four years ago," said Libman. "Certainly, we had strong support in the Jewish community, but the red tide swept the rest of the riding, where the Trudeau name still has magic."

Libman added that, despite what some Liberal supporters claim, he did not take any personal shots at Cotler nor imply that he supported Harper, but simply quoted him and cited his record on where he, Cotler, disagreed with his leader, Trudeau, especially on combating ISIS and terrorism.

Libman wished Housefather well, but said, "We will be watching closely where Trudeau will lead the country in foreign affairs... I hope we are wrong. Time will tell."

Although the Conservatives – including Stephen Harper himself, who launched his campaign there on Aug. 2 –fought hard for Mount Royal, the Liberals were consistently ahead in the polls.

Cotler told The CJN he believes Housefather clinched it for four main reasons: "the rising boat effect," in other words, all Liberals benefited from leader Justin Trudeau's soaring popularity; the "antipathy" toward Harper, which he believes was strong, at least outside Côte St. Luc and Hampstead; the drop in NDP support, which was 18 per cent in the 2011 election; and Housefather was an "excellent" candidate.

He also said Libman's aggressive style was counterproductive. "I think people are tired of negative campaigning," said Cotler, who won Mount Royal in 2011 with a 42 per cent plurality when the turnout was 57 per cent. Turnout was about 70 per cent this time. Libman, 54, an architect by profession and former Côte St. Luc mayor and Equality Party member of the Quebec National Assembly, tried to make this a contest of who supports Israel more and who is tougher on terrorism.

Finance Minister Joe Oliver a casualty of Liberal sweep

PAUL LUNGEN

Conservative MPs in Jewish-populated ridings in Toronto were caught up in the red tide that vaulted the Liberal Party to victory in the Oct. 19 general election, with Finance Minister Joe Oliver the most prominent casualty.

Oliver and York Centre MP Mark Adler lost the seats they won in the 2011 election to Liberals Marco Mendocino and Michael Levitt, respectively. MP Peter Kent retained the Tory seat in Thornhill, just north of Toronto.

Eglinton-Lawrence and York Centre had been longstanding Liberal strongholds until the Tories' snatched them in the 2011 election, which returned a Conservative majority.

Oliver's defeat had to be considered the biggest upset. A high-profile cabinet minister largely responsible for steering the economy through difficult economic times, he had also been at the forefront of trumpeting the Tories' strong support for Israel "through fire and water."

Liberal and NDP candidates in both ridings, along with the party leaders, attempted to undercut that Conservative theme by voicing their own strong support for Israel.

According to an online poll conducted by The CJN about three weeks before the election, 44 per cent of our readers supported Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the Conservatives. To what extent that issue played a part in the final results is unclear this early after the election, but it likely played a role in some Jewish voters' decisions in the three Toronto-area ridings, each of which count substantial Jewish populations.

According to Statistics Canada's 2011 National Household Survey (NHS), Thornhill is home to 45,715 people who identify themselves as Jewish, or 33 per cent of the population.

The numbers are less, but still substantial in the two Toronto ridings. According to the same NHS findings, 24,405 people identify themselves as Jewish in Eglinton-Lawrence, which is about 22 per cent of the population, while 21,310 residents identify themselves as Jewish in York Centre, or about 18 per cent of the population.

The final tally in Eglinton-Lawrence showed that Mendocino, a former federal prosecutor, received 27,494 votes, or 50 per cent of those cast, to Oliver's 21,601, or 39 per cent. New Democrat Andrew Thomson trailed with six per cent of the vote.

In 2011, Oliver grabbed the riding from longstanding Liberal MP Joe Volpe with 22,633 votes (46.8 per cent) to 18,597 (38.5 per cent) for the Grits. In back-to-back elections, Oliver decreased his votes by about 1,000, while Mendocino grew the Liberal total by around 9,000.

Levitt re-captured York Centre for the Liberals with 20,109 votes (46.8 per cent) to Adler's 18,893 (44 per cent). Hal Berman of the NDP received 3,148 votes (7.3 per cent).

In 2011, Adler took York Centre for the Tories for the first time since 1962, after receiving 20,355 votes (48.5 per cent) to incumbent MP Ken Dryden's 13,979 votes (33.3 per cent).

From 2011 to 2015, Adler's tally dropped by nearly 1,500 votes, while the Liberals increased their total by around 6,000 votes.

Speaking a couple of days after the returns were in, Levitt was savouring his victory and looking forward to getting to work in Ottawa. "It's definitely been an exciting time," he said. "It's just a fantastic feeling."

Levitt attributed his win to the voters' appetite for change after 10 years of the Harper government. The Liberal platform on the economy, refugees and social policy resonated with voters, as did the party's clear statement of support of Israel and its opposition to the BDS movement.

In winning York Centre, Levitt was returning the riding to the Liberal fold. Prior to Adler's 2011 victory, it had been represented since 1962 by Liberals James Walker, Bob Kaplan, Art Eggleton and Dryden.

One Conservative MP who bucked the Liberal trend was former newsman Peter Kent. The incumbent representative for Thornhill, Kent received 31,911 votes (58.6 per cent) to Liberal Nancy Coldham's 18,385 (33.7 per cent). New Democrat Lorne Cherry received 2,820 votes (5.2 per cent).

Despite Kent's comfortable win, the margin of victory narrowed from 2011 to 2015. Four years ago, Kent took Thornhill with 36,629 votes (61.4 per cent) over Karen Mock of the Liberals, who received 14,125 votes (23.7 per cent).

The riding, which was created in 1997 from parts of Markham-Whitchurch-Stouffville and York North, had been held by Liberals Elinor Kaplan and Susan Kadis prior to Kent's first victory in 2008. ■

CAMPAIGN NOTEBOOK

What does the Liberal win mean for Jewish groups?

Daniel Wolgelerenter

The longest election campaign in modern Canadian history delivered more than a surprise Liberal majority – it yielded six new Jewish MPs for the winning party: Michael Levitt in Toronto's York Centre; Anthony Housefather in Mount Royal, and Jim Carr in Winnipeg South Centre – all ridings with large Jewish populations – as well as Julie Dabrusin in Toronto-Danforth, Karina Gould in Burlington, Ont., and David Graham in Quebec's Laurentides–Labelle riding.

The election also saw the defeat of Stephen Harper, Canada's most vocally pro-Israel prime minister ever, as well as a loss by Joe Oliver, Canada's first Jewish finance minister, and the retirement of respected Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

The campaign was perhaps the most divisive one ever for the Jewish community. Reminiscent of the U.S. right's disdain for President Barack Obama, some of Harper's Jewish supporters were especially vocal – both on social media and in more traditional channels – in wildly accusing Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau of, in effect, being a front for radical Islam.

By the end, there was pushback from a number of Jewish commentators, who noted that all three major parties voiced strong support for Israel and condemned the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

Did this motivate some Jewish voters to shift allegiances back to the Liberals, the community's historical home, after exit polls registered 52 per cent support among Jews for the Tories in 2011?

Conservative commentator Michael Diamond and the progressive Jewish group JSpace probably don't agree on much, but they both contend that Liberal wins in some of the "Jewish" ridings signalled that there was a shift among Jews toward the Liberals. As JSpace said in a statement, it "showed that there is a return to the progressive orientation of Jews in Canada," or as Diamond writes in this week's CJN, "many traditional Liberals who had moved into the Conservative fold returned to vote Liberal, believing that Trudeau would be for Israel what Harper had been."

However, there are no hard numbers yet – in the form of exit polling or riding return breakdowns – to support this contention. In fact, anecdotal evidence might suggest otherwise.

For instance, in the country's most "Jewish" riding, Thornhill, Conservative Peter Kent was re-elected with nearly 60 per cent of the vote, down only three percentage points from 2011 (albeit with a lower vote tally). And in Eglinton-Lawrence and York Centre, respectively, defeated Tories Oliver and Mark Adler each only lost about 1,500 votes compared to 2011, though voter turnout was higher in both ridings.

So it appears the Jewish vote for the Tories was again quite strong.

This raises another question: what do the election results mean for the community's relations with the new government?

While mainstream Jewish advocacy groups are all nominally non-partisan, they've all been very supportive of Harper and Conservative policies over the years, particularly on Israel.

Nevertheless, while also thanking Harper for his support for Israel and the Jewish community, they all warmly congratulated Trudeau on his victory last week and said they looked forward to working with him.

No doubt Trudeau and his team will, and should, take them at their word.

But after a decade of sometimes appearing to cozy up to the Liberals' political rivals, could these groups have trouble working with the new government?

That was the point JSpace tried to make when it said the election "created somewhat of a dilemma for the organized Jewish community. Some groups have put all their political capital behind the Conservative party. Now they will have to figure out how to represent the diversity of Jewish opinion to the newly elected government."

That sentiment cuts both ways, however, since Jews once again appear to have given Harper and the Tories a fair amount of support, so their views will need to be taken into account by mainstream Jewish groups as they interact with the new government.

How they'll try to meet that challenge and what kind of balance they'll need, or be able, to strike are open questions.

It won't necessarily be easy, though Jews and Jewish groups have historically had deep ties to the Liberal party, so they won't be starting from zero.

But it wouldn't be surprising if the Liberals were wary of the organized Jewish community, despite having courted Jews during the campaign with assurances about Israel and the BDS movement.

If that's the case, those six new Jewish Liberal MPs could come in handy quite quickly. ■

Winning a Spiritual War Takes Spirit

Dr. Michael Laitman
Professor of Ontology

What do you call a crazed Palestinian man—who until that moment was working alongside Israeli Jews for an Israeli phone company—deliberately driving his car into a bus stop, running over the pedestrians, then stepping out of his car and frantically stabbing these same people (caution: graphic images, viewer discretion is strongly advised)? What do you call two Palestinian children, ages 13 and 15, stabbing Jews, one of whom is their age (13), just because they're Jewish? Are they accountable for their actions? What does it take to turn children into coldblooded assassins? How do you define a situation where such madness happens all over Israel, multiple times a day? And finally, what does it make you think when global media, fully aware of the situation, almost completely ignore it, at best, or present terrorists as innocent Palestinians civilians killed for no reason by Israeli security forces? How does this compare to the reaction of global media when the organization Price Tag committed a terror attack against a Palestinian family?

As an Israeli, it is hard to speak of responsibility when emotions of terror and vengeance permeate every sensible corner still left in our minds. But precisely because I am so concerned for our people, I must look beyond the pain and describe what I see as our only way out. As a Jew who's lost almost his entire family in the Holocaust, and who's lived in Israel through wars and terror attacks, I feel compelled to speak out and not let the instinct of retribution take over.

The war we are at with the Arab world is not about territory. It is over a spiritual, universal task that we, Jews, must carry out. Before the establishment of the state of Israel, two great leaders, whose wisdom is now growing more evident than ever, predicted the current battle, and presented its solution. They knew that if we did not implement it we would find ourselves in deep trouble.

In one of his letters, the Rav Kook wrote, "Every global turmoil comes essentially for Israel. We are called upon for a great and sacred duty, which we are to fulfill willingly and mindfully—to build ourselves and the entire ruined world along with us."

In his book, Ain Ayah, Rav Kook elaborated on our duty: "When Israel arise … to give the entire world a new, corrected form [of brotherly love], not only Israel will rise, but the entire world. …At that time a new era will begin, without the filth of evil. Wickedness and uprising will be gone altogether, anger and sadness will not reign, and concern for the world's balance will be unheard of. At that time violence will disappear, and the sword will lose its prominence and will be utterly condemned."

A contemporary of Rav Kook was another great man who was troubled by the nation's fate. Most of the time, he was busy writing his commentary on The Book of Zohar, which is now regarded as the most elaborate and accurate commentary ever put on paper. But Rav Yehuda Ashlag—now known as Baal HaSulam, after his Sulam (ladder) commentary— also wrote extensively about the fate of the Jewish people and how we can establish a sustainable and thriving country.

In his essay, "Mutual Guarantee," Baal HaSulam stated, "It is incumbent upon the Israeli nation … to qualify itself and the entire world to take upon itself the sublime work of love of others." Later in the article he added, "The Israeli nation was established as a conduit through which sparks of purification will flow on to the entire human race throughout the world."

When Baal HaSulam completed his Sulam commentary, he celebrated the occasion with his students at a very symbolic location: Idra Zuta, the cave where Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai and his disciples wrote The Zohar. But what concerned Baal HaSulam was not the tremendous feat he had achieved. He was preoccupied with the future of the state of Israel. He said that we have been given the land, but "we have not received the land into our hands." What he meant was that we have not begun to carry out the task for which we were given the land—uniting ourselves and projecting that unity to the world, as described above.

Moreover, Baal HaSulam chose to end his introduction to The Zohar with a stark warning, detailed over several pages, that Israel must be a role model to the world, or the horrors of the Holocaust will repeat themselves.

I wish it were easier, but the world will not leave us in peace until we muster the courage to unite, truly, regardless of circumstances, but sincerely from the bottom of our hearts. These two great men have given us this message to encourage us to do just that. They knew that Israel's wars are not won with arms, but with spirits. If we embrace the spirit of our nation—the spirit of "love your neighbor as yourself," and "that which you hate do not do unto others"—we will be the strongest nation on earth. Not because we will defeat our enemies, but because we won't have any.

I call upon all Jews whose heart is aching at the state of our nation to unite "as one man with one heart." Let us show the world a model of unity that all of humanity can and wants to embrace. If we unite, the world will see the light at the end of the tunnel of hatred into which we have stumbled, and we will emerge into a bright and promising tomorrow.

He went increasingly on the attack as the campaign drew to a close. In his advertising in the final days of the campaign, he attacked Housefather for continuing to take his mayor's salary, saying Mount Royal residents deserve an MP with "integrity." He also called Housefather "a partner" of Liberal candidates who are "vocal critics of Israel," namely, Omar Alghraba in Mississauga, a former MP and past president of the Canadian Arab Federation who was elected Oct. 19 in Mississauga Centre, and retired general Andrew Leslie, who won in the Ottawa-area riding of Orléans.

Earlier, Libman attempted to demonstrate that Cotler was in line with the Harper government on Canada's participation in the military mission against the Islamic State and on foreign policy generally, something Cotler vigorously refuted.

This CJN reporter received a hostile reception at Libman's campaign office a couple of hours before the polls closed. Mount Royal Conservative Association president Jocelyn Allard physically pushed the reporter out, saying the office was a private place and that the reporter was not invited, and he didn't allow the reporter to speak to Libman.

Libman phoned an hour later to apologize, saying "the manner in which [Allard] spoke to you was completely unacceptable."

In Outremont, an upbeat Bendayan conceded defeat to her team crammed into her headquarters at 12:15 a.m., when she was trailing Mulcair with 33 per cent of the vote to his 42 per cent.

"This is very emotional for me, but not because of the numbers," said the 35-year-old lawyer. "Nobody thought 78 days ago that we had a chance. We gave him [Mulcair] a run for his money. People told me on the street today that they are excited by the vote, that it gave them a message of hope, for a better government."

Bendayan said she remains "there for the party," an apparent allusion to the possibility Mulcair, having led the NDP back to third-party status, will resign. Polls had her catching up and even surpassing the NDP leader in the last week of the campaign.

Bendayan, who is Sephardi and the daughter of Moroccan immigrants, has been active with the Liberals for a dozen years and served on its national executive.

She has been one of the hardest-working candidates, unofficially launching her campaign more than 1-1/2 years ago and, since January when she took a leave of absence from her law firm, stumping full out.

She said she knocked on more than 10,000 doors in Outremont, a sprawling riding that extends well beyond the borough of that name. Mulcair, who has held the riding since 2007, won with 55 per cent of the vote. Previously, Outremont had been Liberal since 1935, except during the Mulroney Progressive Conservative years from 1988 to 1993. Forty-two per cent of residents have French as a mother tongue, and it's home to many different cultural communities.

Rachel Bendayan

One of the most significant are the Chassidim. One of its leaders and a veteran political observer, Alex Werzberger, said he believed the great majority of Chassidim voted Liberal, with a few staying loyal to the Conservatives. The NDP, he said, never enjoyed support in the community.

That switch to the Liberals owes much to Bendayan's determined outreach over a long period. "She's very presentable. She did a lot of legwork, [and] eventually she cracked through the ice," he said.

Two other Sephardi women candidates were defeated: Conservative Valérie Assouline in Pierrefonds-Dollard finished a distant second on the West Island, where the NDP incumbent Lysane Blanchette Lamothe was ousted by Liberal Frank Baylis. Pascale Déry, a former French-language TV journalist considered a star candidate by the Conservatives, finished fourth in semi-rural Drummond, northeast of Montreal. She had unsuccessfully challenged Libman for the Conservative nomination in Mount Royal.

The wariness about Trudeau and the Liberals on Israel is still prevalent among some Jewish Montrealers. On election day, The CJN was emailed by Edmond Silber a video entitled "The Truth About Justin Trudeau and the Liberals." It concludes "Justin Trudeau is dangerous."

It implies Trudeau is sympathetic to Islamic radicals, showing him speaking at a conference in 2012, allegedly funded by IFRAN, a group linked to Hamas, and praying at a Montreal mosque that year that the video alleges is suspected of being a site for Al Qaeda recruitment. It also says his brother, documentary filmmaker Alexandre Trudeau, is biased against Israel. ■

Publication prompts unease over its anti-Jewish articles

plungen@thecjn.ca

Your Ward News, a newsletter that openly espouses its admiration for Adolf Hitler, is expanding its presence in Thorncliffe Park, a Toronto neighbourhood with a heavy Muslim presence.

In its most recent edition, distributed about three weeks ago, editor-in-chief James Sears addresses "our Muslim brothers and sisters" under the headline, "Thorncliffe Park jihad against pedophilia; child grooming Marxist exit stage left!"

The 16-page publication features a front page with a pastiche of photos including Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne and disgraced former deputy education minister Ben Levin, who are flanked by stone-throwers wearing keffiyahs and the Palestinian flag.

Inside the newsletter, there are Photoshopped images of Adolf Hitler, including one in which he's wearing a T-shirt decorated with the Palestinian flag; an article that says "acts of genocide and terror [are] perpetrated against Palestinians by blood-thirsty Zionist Talmudic Jews"; and a claim that today's Jews are descendants of Khazars, a Turkic tribe.

In a particularly disturbing illustration, the publication shows a photo of an infant dressed for Halloween wearing a Nazi uniform and a Hitler mustache.

The newsletter also promotes Sears' candidacy as an independent in the recently concluded national election. He received 254 votes in Beaches-East York.

Simon Rosenblum discovered the newsletter in his mail box a few weeks ago and found it unsettling. It is openly anti-Jewish, anti-gay and anti-left. It is clear in its admiration for Hitler and it is insulting in its characterization of high profile politicians, he said.

Rosenblum, past president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now Toronto, said he has brought his concerns to Canada Post, which he believes should not be delivering the newsletter.

Canada Post did not respond to The CJN's request for a comment, but in May, when controversy over Your Ward News first surfaced, a spokesperson said it did not meet the standard for "non-mailable matter."

Rosenblum has also spoken to the staff of incoming area MP Rob Oliphant, hoping the new Liberal government will discuss the legalities of distributing the material with Canada Post. And he plans to bring his concerns to the attention of Jewish agencies charged with protecting the community.

Your Ward News*, which claims a circulation of 77,000, is being delivered by Canada Post.

> It's the kind of stuff the Nazis were distributing.

Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said he found the publication's content "quite disturbing."

He had brought the organization's concerns to the attention of the Toronto police hate crimes unit last May and planned to renew a request that it be investigated for its current content.

Sara Lefton, vice-president for Greater Toronto Area with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, echoed Benlolo's concerns.

"This is a disgusting publication that consistently disparages the Jewish People with crude caricatures and horrifically false accusations. We are dismayed that Canada Post continues to deliver this trash, and we have voiced our concern to them directly."

Rosenblum said receiving Your Ward News in his mail box made him feel "as if you lived in Germany in 1927. It's the kind of stuff the Nazis were distributing."

Rosenblum, who is retired, said Your Ward News boasts that it distributes 77,000 copies and is addressed to Muslims in Thorncliffe Park.

"When you live in an area that has an element within it that are not friendly to Jews and definitely hostile to Israel, you have people here who could be receptive to this message," he said. ■

Holocaust Education Week will focus on liberation

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Shael Rosenbaum and Marilyn Sinclair

This year's Holocaust Education Week marks the 70th anniversary of the end of World War II, a springboard for its theme, "Liberation: Aftermath and Rebirth."

The theme is "very complex," says Marilyn Sinclair, chair of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre. "We would like to think of liberation as a singularly joyful event, but [survivors] had to face the reality that their families were murdered, their communities in ruins, and virtually everything they held dear to them was lost... So they had to set their minds to rebuilding their families, their lives, their homes and communities – most in far away places."

Toronto's 35th annual Holocaust Education Week (HEW) offers 162 programs, including lectures, cultural programs, workshops and survivor testimonies, held at synagogues, churches and other venues.

The event, which runs from Nov. 2 to 9, with some programs before and after, is considered the largest of its kind in the world, Sinclair said. But when it began, HEW, co-chaired this year by Dori Ekstein and Lily Kim, was "a little Jewish grassroots program," Sinclair noted. Last year, there were 32,000 attendees, with a similar number expected this year. The opening night program with historian David Eisenhower, grandson of former U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower, has created "a buzz in the community," Sinclair said. Eisenhower will discuss the liberation under his grandfather's command and its aftermath, at Adath Israel Congregation Nov. 2.

For Shael Rosenbaum, who takes over from Sinclair as the centre's chair next month, Eisenhower's talk has particular resonance. "He's a grandson of the liberator, and I'm a grandson of the liberated, so personally, it's very important to me," he said. Rosenbaum, who will be the first third-generation chair of the centre, said his generation knows that they are the last ones to learn about the Holocaust from first-hand testimonies. "It's really our obligation to learn about it," he said.

One of his goals as incoming chair is to get more young people involved.

Hearing survivor speakers is powerful, according to both Sinclair and Rosenbaum. Sinclair said her late father, Ernie Weiss, received a letter from a Muslim girl after he spoke at her school, telling him that boys who used to pull on her hijab and tease her started being nice to her after hearing him. Stories like that fuel Sinclair's optimism that Holocaust education is making a difference in the fight against racism and anti-Semitism.

One of the "highlight programs" of HEW is a symposium geared to young adults in their 20s and 30s, Rosenbaum said. The program, now in its sixth year, will be held Nov. 1 at Ryerson University's Oakham House (registration is at www.holocaustcentre.com/YPs). Among the speakers are Martin Maxwell, who is both a Holocaust survivor and a war veteran, and keynote speaker Tomaz Jardim, a historian at the university, who will discuss the trials of Ilse Koch, "The Bitch of Buchenwald."

Other programs during the week include "Restoring Family Trees Severed by the Holocaust" (Nov. 3 at Kehillat Shaarei Torah) and "Justice and Forgiveness," with three survivors who attended this year's trial of former Auschwitz guard Oskar Groening (Nov. 3 at Petah Tikva Congregation).

On Nov. 5 in the evening, scholar-in-residence Hilary Earl, a Holocaust historian at Nipissing University, will speak about the reintegration of Nazi war criminals into German society, at Beth Tzedec Congregation; while Adara Goldberg, education director of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, will discuss "Holocaust Survivors in Canada: Exclusion, Inclusion, Transformation," at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

On Oct. 22, the Azrieli Foundation held a gala at the Carlu to mark the 10th anniversary of its Holocaust survivors memoirs program and to launch "RE:COLLECTION," a new online initiative that lets users explore the first-hand accounts of Holocaust survivors.

Portraits of HEW's 46 survivor speakers, by Toronto photographer Elliot Sylman, will be on display at the Miles Nadal JCC from Nov. 1 to 26.

The week will finish on Nov. 9, the 77th anniversary of Kristallnacht, with a talk at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation by architecture professor Marc Grellert, of the Technical University of Darmstadt. He will discuss the digital reconstruction of synagogues in Germany that were destroyed during Kristallnacht. ■

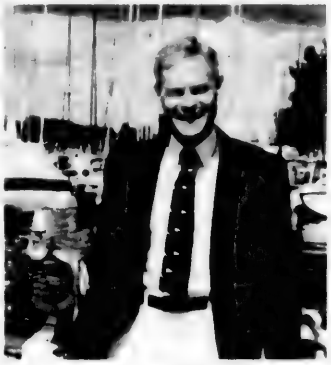
OJA collects stories of South African Jews

For more than 40 years, the Ontario Jewish Archives, Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre (OJA) has been collecting and the preserving the stories of our Jewish community. Earlier this year, they launched the South African Legacy Project, an exciting initiative to collect material from South African Jews who immigrated to Ontario.

Over the past year, many Jewish Southern Africans have shared their stories and records (photos, letters, memoirs, scrapbooks) with the OJA as part of a special initiative to document and preserve the community's immigration experiences. This is the OJA's first collection development initiative focused on a specific immigrant group, and the OJA plans to use this pilot as a model to work with other groups in the future. The OJA has been working with a committee including Stephen Pincus, Colin Baskind, John Cohen, Lorraine Sandler and Heather Super.

Although the first large wave of immigrants from Southern Africa started arriving in Canada soon after the Soweto Riots in 1976, a small number of immigrants did begin arriving as early as the 1950s. The earliest immigrant to connect with the OJA is Percy Skuy, a pharmacist who ended up in Toronto by chance in 1957. He had run short on money while travelling through the United States and needed to earn enough for the fare back to Africa. Unable to work in the States, he headed to Toronto to find work, accepting a sales position that came with a car. "I took it really for the car ... and never left. I fell in love with Toronto."



Ivor Simmons at Island Yacht Club, 1994

Percy Skuy at Redpath Pharmacy, 1960

On the 2011 National Household Survey, 4,725 Jews from Toronto indicated they were born in South Africa. Although relatively few in number, project chair Stephen Pincus explains, "immigrants from Southern Africa have had a significant impact on Canada in a broad range of fields.

"We hope that the Legacy Project will document many of the fascinating stories comprising this remarkable immigration."

As more individual stories come into the archives, the larger community story is beginning to emerge: why they left South Africa and Zimbabwe, why they chose Canada, initial impressions of Canada, the challenges they faced when integrating into life here, the differences and similarities in Jewish traditions, and the important role they have played in Ontario's Jewish community.

The project involves the collection of family portraits, images of holiday celebrations and other photographs, letters, speeches, family videos, diaries, and cookbooks. Everything collected is stored in the OJA's state-of-the-art storage vault and made accessible to researchers and will also be accessible on the OJA's website. This initiative is an opportunity to ensure that the stories of this unique immigrant experience are preserved for future generations. ■

Seniors surrounded by creative arts

The arts-based programs offered at the Terraces of Baycrest Retirement Residence and the Joseph E. Minnie Wagman Centre allow seniors a way to feel invigorated again.

Seniors attending the classes come from the Terraces of Baycrest and also the community. For many, creating art helps them achieve a renewed sense of self.

"Seniors form friendship bonds through the classes," says Merav Jacobson, marketing manager at the Terraces. "Social engagement gives them a sense of purpose."

Art classes are excellent for seniors because they're not a highly physical activity. Instead they flex the imaginative part of the brain. Creating art requires focus and follow-through, and seniors derive a sense of pride from creating something beautiful.

"Older adults have to deal with a lot of losses. They lose spouses, other family members and dear friends in their lives. They often lose certain physical abilities, and the whole point here, is to focus on what they're still able to do," Jacobson says.

Shirley Milner, 82, joined the Wagman Centre following a hospital stay that lasted almost a year. The hospital social worker recommended she get involved with community-based programs. Milner chose the Wagman Centre, and credits the experience for helping turn her life around.

"We work on projects that are so important," says Milner. "We are making Christmas cards for kids in a hospital. We also made 1,080 Rosh Hashanah bookmarks for Meals On Wheels, so that recipients also received a holiday greeting from us."

Milner has been taking art classes at the centre for over two years and takes the Wheel Trans bus in on weekdays. She adores the creative outlet and social interaction that the classes give her.

"I paint with acrylics, I do silk paintings, I did a beading program, and I've made gifts for my family. I find it the most amazing place," she says. "It's hard to explain, but it keeps your mind so busy, so occupied."

The membership fees for community members are reasonable at $80 a year, with some classes having additional nominal fees. For the Terraces residents all programs are included in their monthly rent along with a wide-range of support services such as meals and medical services.

The centre offers 130 programs each week.

"We offer music programs, theatre groups, dance therapy and creative arts classes, so there's something for everyone," Jacobson says. "Art is displayed across the building, but it's not a passive experience of just looking at it. Residents live it, they are surrounded by it. It's an important part of their life."

Shirley Milner creates art at the Terraces of Baycrest/ Wagman Centre.

Another popular program is the Dance Movement Therapy program. "It is more than just learning new dance styles to wonderful music," says Krista Samborsky, dance movement therapist at the Terraces/Wagman. "It is a time to come together with old and new friends to share a laugh and be creative."

Baycrest also has a Wellness Café program, which supports seniors in their journey to achieving physical, emotional and cognitive wellness. It offers educational and interactive workshops, including those on topics like memory health, safety in the community, art therapy and movement therapy. ■

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK
Presents

FROM DESPAIR TO HOPE
Yiddish Songs of Liberation, Aftermath and Rebirth
With
Cantor Deborah Staiman
Pianist Asher Farber

Thursday, November 5, 2015 - 2:00 PM

This moving concert created by Toronto-born Deborah Staiman will present responses to the Holocaust through post-war Yiddish poetry set to music. Originally an opera singer, Deborah earned a Master of Sacred Music and ordination from Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York City.
The songs powerfully convey the emotional journey of the survivors which included shock, anger, rage, depression, cynicism, and ultimately the desire to rebuild their lives. Together with English translations which will be provided, narration will give relevant backgrounds of the poets (H. Leivik, Itsik Manger, Kadya Molodowsky, Shmerke Kaczerginski, and Chaim Grade) and composers (Folk, Israel Alter, Beresovsky, Lazar Weiner and Maurice Rauch) as the music moves from utter despair to hope. Deborah will be accompanied by pianist Asher Farber.

Living well is the best revenge

MARILYN LAZAR

Many seniors approach retirement unsure of what to expect with more time and less responsibility. Couple that with a cornucopia of age-related conditions and concerns, and add all this to the backdrop of a society that is exponentially speeding up while comprehension and metabolism may be slowing down.

How can we make sure our "olden" years are our "golden" years? Here are some tips:

Make and keep doctors' appointments. Stay on top of simple medical tests. Certain diseases are preventable with routine screening. Incorporate devices such as hearing aids to ensure that you don't miss one precious word of conversation that keeps you connected and vibrant. Confide in your family doctor about changes you are experiencing – and about your feelings with regard to these changes.

It's up to you whether you opt for prescription medication, natural supplements or lifestyle change – but knowing your options is an empowering feeling.

Increasingly, research findings support an active lifestyle and intense physical activity, and show the benefits are not just physical. Resistance training becomes even more important over time as it can mitigate age-related loss of muscle mass and bone density. Weight training continues to boost metabolism even when your body is at rest. Speeding up your metabolism will also give you a better appetite and increase your ability to ingest and digest all the nutrients your active body needs.

Seniors may need fewer calories as metabolism slows and activity level decreases. However, vitamins, minerals and protein are as crucial as ever. Ensure your meals are nutrient dense and appealing. Don't fall into an "I won't bother" pattern if you're eating by yourself. Even a main course of eggs is nutritious, delicious, economical and can be spruced up with cheese or fresh herbs. Experiment with a new recipe and invite a friend for dinner.

Stay in touch with people whom you care about and who care about you, be it friends or grandchildren. It's helpful to associate with individuals of all ages. Be informed and stay relevant.

Exercise your brain. Read the paper, watch the news and engage in dialogue with a variety of people. Take a course, whether it's a new language or art appreciation. Keep up with the times. Improve your skills by taking a class in a community college or continuing education setting. Email is a wonderful way to stay connected to people, no matter how far away or in what time zone. ■

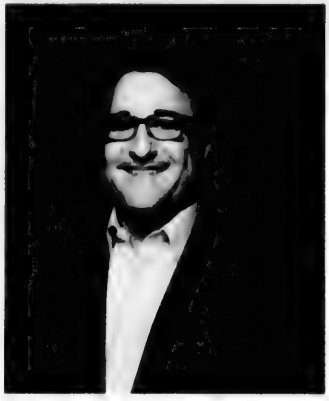
Caregiving is important to quality of life

DAVID BERNSTEIN
PRESIDENT, CAREGIVER SERVICES LTD.



David Bernstein

As we age, most of us want to enjoy retirement in a comfortable, familiar setting – home. Sometimes, however, we need help. Often a family member or loved one can be there. If you've received care you know how critical that support is to your quality of life. If you have been there for a loved one, you know how emotionally exhausting being the provider can be. Sometimes, it's necessary to have assistance from a professional caregiver or personal support worker (PSW). Whoever provides it, caregiving adds tremendous quality to the lives of everyone involved.

Living in a retirement home provides many benefits to help us live independently and get the support we need when necessary. But even in these environments our circumstances change and additional support is needed beyond what the retirement home can provide.

One of the most critical situations we face is hospital stays. Although our healthcare system can provide great care and our family's support is critical, to ensure that we or our loved one is consistently advocated for and engaged often requires additional support. PSWs and caregivers are ideally suited to provide this support as well.

> Professional support from a caregiver or PSW can take many forms

Professional support from a caregiver or PSW can take many forms:

- A three-hour visit, one day a week, for laundry, grocery shopping, companionship, and to drive you to an occasional appointment or for banking.
- A three-hour visit, three days a week in a retirement home to help with exercises, go for a walk or grocery shop.
- A three-hour visit each morning and evening to assist with bathing, toileting, medicine reminding, meal preparation and generally getting ready for and closing out the day.
- An eight-hour daily visit to assist with personal care, light housekeeping, meal preparation, medication reminding, and to help with mobility and general safety.
- 12-hour overnight care in a hospital while our loved one recuperates from surgery.
- 12-hour daytime care in a hospital to ensure our loved one is advocated for and engaged when we can't be there.
- 12-hour overnight palliative care to ensure somebody is there at all times, giving family a chance to sleep.
- 24-hour live-in care for when family members travel or vacation.
- 24-hour care divided into two, twelve-hour shifts (a day shift and overnight shift) for an individual with significant mobility issues, Alzheimer's disease or dementia requiring constant monitoring.
- 24-hour live-in care where the overnights are not critical but assistance is needed during the day. Knowing someone is there at night can help give everyone involved peace of mind.

The goal is to understand your needs first and design a schedule with an experienced caregiver or PSW who best fits those needs.

Caregiving is about having the patience and empathy to help people in their most vulnerable states. Great caregiving respects and dignifies the lives people have built and lived, and strives to enrich their day-to-day experience wherever possible. ■

When homeland becomes home

DEBORAH FINEBLUM SCHABB
JNS

Like other Jews his age, Gerry Wine remembers the day Israel was born – May 14, 1948 – and the United Nations vote the previous November that opened the door to a Jewish state. He was eight years old.

"These were magical moments for all of us, very, very exciting times," Wine says. "Even us kids were celebrating."

Growing up, Wine recalls wearing blue and white to religious school to honour the nascent state, dropping coins for tzedakah into the blue tin box in the kitchen. But he didn't truly begin to appreciate the miracle of Israel until he was married and a young father, and a non-Jewish friend told him after the Six-Day War in 1967, "'You guys really know how to whup 'em.'

"That offhand comment of his planted a seed, a sense of pride in our people," says Wine.

Even so, Wine never dreamed that the infant nation his family was cheering back in 1948 would become his home more than six decades later.

The official reason Wine and his wife Sandy made aliyah in 2012 was that his son and his family were already living in Modi'in, midway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

"They certainly were the big green light," says Sandy Wine, 74. "But what I did not expect was to fall in love with Israel. If you'd told me 10 years ago I would be living here and loving it, I would have thought you were crazy. Now all I want to know is why doesn't everyone live here?"

As a 19-year-old, Hannah Libman recalls sweating each UN vote.

In 2012, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visits a retirement home, showing residents a picture of David Ben-Gurion's announcement of Israeli independence.
AMOS BEN GERSHOM/GPO/FLASH90

> What I did not expect was to fall in love with Israel

"I sat near the radio and counted them as they came in," she says. "I can still feel it, it was so huge, the joy of it, but also the fear that we would not get the votes we needed."

Understanding that the Holocaust preceded Israel's establishment, Libman valued the moment all the more. She was born in Germany in 1936, and her family escaped before Hitler's net closed on the rest of her relatives.

"We didn't know the details until later, but we knew what was happening over there was terrible, that my grandparents were missing and my father's Polish family was also missing," Libman says. "To us, we knew Israel would be a place where Jews could be safe."

Like the Wines, Libman and her husband Alfred were pulled to Israel by family – a daughter, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. With Hannah now 86 and Alfred nearly 90, the Libmans arrived last summer, and are now living in Jerusalem senior housing.

Seniors begin new life adventure in Israel

Chaya (Claire) Subar, has since 2007 also counted herself a resident of Jerusalem, along with her husband David. Having narrowly escaped death at the hands of the Nazis and spent the war years being cared for by Polish farmers, Subar reunited with her mother by 1948 and was living in a community of Holocaust survivors in Stuttgart, Germany.

"I remember seeing a picture of a short guy with bushy eyebrows and bushy hair," says Subar, who is now in her mid-70s. "And I knew that he had something to do with a new country for Jewish people. Everyone we knew was so happy."

Indeed, Holocaust survivors had a deep appreciation for the newly established Jewish state.

Carl and Anita Jacobs, who left for Jerusalem four years ago, are both the same age as the State of Israel – 67.

"Everywhere we go there are these neon signs that say '67' and... I know we're 67, but now they are constantly reminding us," Anita says with a laugh.

In perhaps the ultimate introduction to the Jewish state, Anita had the chance to spend time with former prime minister Golda Meir, who stayed at the family's New Jersey home during a fundraising tour in the 1950s.

"She was very much like my bubbe, very gentle – and taller than you'd think," says Anita.

Even as a child, Anita came to understand the importance of Israel.

"I knew even then that this land is my heritage, and I really wanted to be a part of it," she says.

As a teenager, Anita would help finance her very first trip to Israel in 1965 with her babysitting earnings. Though "jobs and kids and elderly parents" would keep Anita and Carl from leaving for many years, they are now (mostly) retired and free to live their Israel dream, which includes regular army base volunteer stints through the IDF's Sar-El program.

"Living here at our age is the frosting on the cake of our lives," says Hannah Libman, who was scurrying around her apartment preparing lunch for four granddaughters. "We had a wonderful life (before), but now I feel like I came home."

As to what the future holds for their adopted homeland, most of the seniors

JNS.org spoke with are cautiously optimistic. Carl Jacobs is concerned by the recent surge in anti-Semitic attacks around the world and the ongoing negative media coverage of Israel.

"Plus so many Jewish kids in North America are not prepared to refute it," he says. "They just don't know the real story of the Jewish people and the importance of Israel."

Sixteen years into her life in Israel, Barbara Greenberg describes herself as "optimistic, because our greatest strength is our people, the mix of people from all over, and for the most part, everyone gets along. We understand the importance of having a Jewish state, especially since our homeland has become our home too." ■

Four Elms gets an inspired makeover

It's the same great services with a brand new attitude.

Four Elms Retirement Residence, located at Steeles Avenue and Dufferin Street, has now taken on a new name, Verve Senior Living, and that means some exciting changes are well underway.

"We are now Inspired Senior Living with Verve, and so we've taken on a new philosophy on how we operate," said Reesa Soto, marketing manager for Four Elms. "Diversicare (who owned and operated us) was known for its care, and we will still offer superior care, but we also want to ensure that all of our community members here are inspired and feeling fulfilled on a day-to-day basis.

"We want to do whatever it takes to make them feel that way. We want everyone to have a great day, every day."

Four Elms wants its community members to thrive and have a purpose, and its new mantra should lead to that. "The philosophy is for us to create communities where spirit, body and mind flourish every single day. That's really what we're all about. It's all about making a difference in the lives of people living with us.

"We obviously do that by providing superior care and wonderful social, fitness and wellness activities, which are a huge component. That's what makes everything so great here," Soto says.

With events including daily fitness and ranging from painting classes to lectures to live entertainment and outings in their van, there is plenty to keep the residents going. "They wake up each morning and have a purpose to get dressed and come downstairs," Soto said. "There's three delicious and amazing meals there for them every day in the dining room and a huge selection of activities."

With Inspired Senior Living with Verve, the idea of keeping the community members mentally and emotionally healthy is every bit as important as the physical aspect. "If we're not inspiring them, they're not going to be happy," Soto said. "They need to be stimulated.

"A lot of these people are coming from homes they've lived in for 50 to 60 years, or condos, where they were feeling kind of lonely and isolated," Soto added. "Their children are working full time and their grandchildren are working or in school. In order for them to come here and feel good, they have to feel inspired. It's all part of it."

Four Elms still offers the ability for community members to age in place, being able to provide assisted living care in one's suite along with other supplementary care services. They also continue to use BrainGym, a multi-sensory brain stimulation program, for those residing on its memory-care floor, and it is available for all other Four Elms community members. Four Elms has a good number of Jewish community members and provides the opportunity for them to stay in touch with their religion.

"We are servicing independent seniors and we have a large Jewish population," Soto said. "Friday afternoons we have a pre-Shabbat service and Friday night there's always a Shabbat menu option. We celebrate all of the holidays, with Chanukah and Passover and Rosh Hashanah." ■

Jerome Diamond had a passion for social work

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Jerome Diamond

Sara Diamond remembers that when she was growing up, her father Jerome Diamond, who died Oct. 19 at the age of 100, told her there were three things she needed to learn how to do as a woman: fly a plane, drive a car and type.

"He was the kind of father who would get you a science kit and a Betty Crocker baking oven... He built a flight simulator for me that I used to practise flying with him every summer. At 16, he made sure I learned to drive a car. I was a little more resistant about the typing," she chuckled.

Diamond, who was born in 1915 to Jewish American parents in New York City, was extremely devoted to social service work and a trailblazer in the Jewish community for advocating open dialogue about violence against women.

Diamond was also a decorated military man, receiving a Bronze Star in World War II. He served in the first integrated regiment of the U.S. Corps of Engineers as a major, designing and building the landing craft that carried tanks and heavy artillery to Omaha Beach on D-Day in June 1944.

In addition to his passion for social justice, Diamond was extremely handy.

He initially studied engineering at City College of New York City, where he received a bachelor of science degree.

Sara said her father was pursuing a law degree when he realized that what he really wanted was to serve the larger Jewish community. "Service was in his bloodstream – my dad was amazing that way. He really cared about people and wanted to make sure they had the quality of life that he believed was possible in postwar American and Canadian society."

Diamond went on to get a master's in social work from the University of Pennsylvania and began studying psychoanalysis in order to qualify as a psychiatric social worker.

He became director of the Bronx Jewish Family and Child Services and worked there until 1959, when he was offered the job of executive director of Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto.

He moved to the city with his first wife Mary Swit Diamond, a family court judge and social worker, and worked at JF&CS until his retirement in 1981.

In the 1970s, Diamond founded a JF&CS youth mental health centre called Centre Shelanu, which was later re-named, in his honour, the Jerome D. Diamond Centre for Adolescents.

The centre provides counselling, education and a safe space for young people struggling with psychological, behavioural and academic challenges.

An ardent supporter of society's most marginalized people, Diamond was one of the first men in social services to bring the issue of violence against women in the Jewish community to the fore, urging that it be countered through dialogue and action.

"For his generation, he was incredibly progressive regarding the rights of women. He got that from his unbelievable mother – my Grandma Rose – who lived with him and my stepmother until she died. She instilled strong Jewish values in my father, like the passion and demand for service to one's community," Sara Diamond said.

Diamond was also known for forging alliances between Jewish, Catholic and secular social services and consulting on the development of legislation such as the Family Law Reform Act and the Young Offenders Act.

His social service work included helping Latin American immigrants to Canada who were victims of torture and families dealing with Holocaust trauma.

After his first wife passed away in 1964, Diamond married Sheila Senderowitz Diamond, who died when he was in his 80s.

Diamond cared deeply about his Judaism, returning to religion with renewed vigour after his first wife's death and becoming very involved in Holy Blossom Temple, where he sometimes led services.

Diamond spent the last year and a half of his life living in Baycrest. He died from Alzheimer's disease several days after celebrating his 100th birthday with family and friends.

Ottawa woman needs urgent kidney transplant

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

An urgent plea is being made to find a living liver donor to save the life of a member of the Ottawa Jewish community.

Leslie Kaufman, vice-president of corporate services at the Jewish Federation of Ottawa (JFO), is fighting for her life in the Toronto General Hospital's transplant unit.

Her husband, Sam Greenspon, said Kaufman, 56, had been ill for several years, but with a variety of seemingly unrelated symptoms which, in retrospect, seem to have been the cause of her liver failure. Last winter, during a bout of what she thought was bronchitis, Kaufman was prescribed antibiotics. She became jaundiced and was diagnosed in February with primary biliary cirrhosis, a disease in which the bile ducts in the liver are slowly destroyed. Greenspon said that this is an autoimmune disease and Kaufman was probably born with it.

After being in and out of hospital during the summer, Kaufman returned to the hospital this fall with dehydration. She was immediately flown to the Toronto General where she remains, waiting desperately for a liver donation.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, rabbi emeritus of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, has for many years been involved with educating and encouraging the community at large, and the Jewish community in particular, to become organ donors. He is the chair of Trillium Gift of Life Network, the provincial agency responsible for organ and tissue donation and transplantation, which also has a program for reimbursing expenses of living organ donors.

Rabbi Bulka partnered with the Ottawa federation to send out an email appeal for a live liver donor.

"Organ donation is all about saving lives. Saving lives is the pre-eminent kindness we can do for others... It enhances lives and uplifts the donor and the donor's family. It is magical," he said. "Leslie's situation is heart-wrenching, and we fervently hope a donor will come forward."

One potential donor is Kaufman's colleague Bram Bregman, vice-president of community building at the JFO. "With 100 per cent support by my amazing wife, I am being tested to donate a portion of my liver to my dear colleague, Leslie," Bregman said.

"Although I feel nervous, especially with 15-month-old twins at home, I felt it was the right thing to do. I have been raised in a community that taught me to think of others, to be a giver, and that life matters more than anything else, and this is what I want to pass on to my children."

Andrea Freedman, president and CEO of the JFO, is a colleague and a friend of Kaufman's. "This is deeply personal and professional for me. Leslie is a fantastic colleague and Jewish communal professional, selflessly serving our community. And she is also a doting grandmother who came to the office every Monday morning with a new story about her grandson. It keeps me up late at night knowing that someone out there has the power to save Leslie's life, and it is our responsibility to keep looking until we succeed in finding a match," she said.

Many people are unaware that a donor's liver will completely regenerate itself within a couple of months and that a potential donor does not have to be a blood relative but must have a compatible blood type.

If you are willing to begin the process of being tested for suitability and to do the greatest mitzvah of helping to save a life, please contact the Toronto General Hospital's Living Donor Liver Office co-ordinator at 416-340-4800, ext. 4711. ■

Trudeau: No reason to expect he'll disappoint the Jews

During the 2014 conflict between Israel and Gaza, Trudeau released a statement that said, "Israel has the right to defend itself and its people. Hamas is a terrorist organization and must cease its rocket attacks immediately."

He condemned Hamas for rejecting an Egyptian proposal for a ceasefire while commending Israel for accepting it "and demonstrating its commitment to peace."

In March, when McGill University students were called on to vote in support of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel, Trudeau tweeted, "The BDS movement, like Israeli Apartheid Week, has no place on Canadian campuses. As a @McGillU alum, I'm disappointed."

Benlolo said he's encouraged by that kind of rhetoric.

"This is a good starting point, and I have no reason to expect that Mr. Trudeau will disappoint the Jewish community in Canada."

Nelson Wiseman, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said he suspects that under Trudeau's leadership, Canada will continue to support Israel, as it has traditionally.

"It might abstain more in the UN on issues. Its diplomats are going to be given a looser leash in the area… I think it will be more the way it was during the Chrétien years, which isn't really, in terms of content, much different," Wiseman said.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs president and CEO Shimon Fogel, suspects that there will be differences in "style and emphasis."

"However, Prime Minister-designate Trudeau has been clear that his government's policies on the core issues of concern to the pro-Israel community will entirely reflect the positions staked out by the previous government," Fogel said.

"We believe that Canada's positions on these issues will reflect a degree of continuity and stability, including unequivocal support for Israel –diplomatically, in terms of security, opposition to radicalism, the demonization of Israel and the legitimacy of the Jewish state."

Karen Mock, co-founder of the left-leaning Zionist organization JSpace and the former director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, said she's confident Trudeau will make Canadian Jews feel as safe and supported as Harper did.

"I think he will be as good a friend in the kinds of things he says about Israel. I think he will be a better friend in having the ability and credibility and the commitment to actually put into practice the peacekeeping, the negotiations, the bringing of parties together and regaining our stature on the world stage," said Mock, who ran as a Liberal in 2011, when she lost to Tory Peter Kent in Thornhill.

Myer Siemiatycki, a professor of politics and public administration at Ryerson University, said he thinks Trudeau is off to a good start on the Israel file.

> He has signalled his commitment to the security of Israel
> Myer Siemiatycki, professor of politics, Ryerson University

"He has signalled his commitment to the security of Israel, and he has also signalled, in a way that may prove to be more beneficial to Israel, a kind of openness to dialogue and to Canada playing something of a mediating, honest broker role, and significantly promoting a two-state solution. That might actually prove to be much better in Israel's interests in terms of getting to a point of security, peace, etc.," Siemiatycki said.

On the economic front, part of Trudeau's platform was to introduce an income tax cut for the middle class – reducing the 22-per-cent tax rate for people who make between $44,701 and $89,401 a year, to 20.5 per cent – while creating a new tax bracket of 33 per cent for those earning more than $200,000 a year.

Trudeau also proposed a plan to run a $10-billion deficit every year for three years to stimulate the economy and pay for such things as public transit and affordable housing for seniors.

"He is certainly being recognized as the boldest in terms of the three leaders, on the fiscal approach, and all will depend on how it pans out, what the money gets spent on, what the impact of that spending is," Siemiatycki said.

"If it's a disaster, it'll become another argument, for 'No, no, no, you should never get into deficits.' But we have the irony that in virtually every one of his years, that is exactly where Mr. Harper took us. So no one is particularly consistent."

Although the Conservatives had raised the federal deficit to $36 billion in 2010, earlier this year, the Harper government balanced the budget and Canada boasted the lowest debt-to-GDP ratio among the G7 countries.

But the Bank of Canada announced on Oct. 21 that it's reducing its prediction for economic growth for 2016, from 2.3 per cent to two per cent.

Mock said a deficit is nothing Canada can't handle, as long as "we invest in better infrastructure and creating more jobs."

Fogel said Trudeau will be judged by his record and achievements.

"While economic performance is an important element of that record, so, too, are other considerations, like social policy and health care, the environment and foreign policy, law and order and federal-provincial relations. It is a bit early to get out the scorecard just yet." ■

Harper: Online campaign celebrates ex-PM's leadership

Karen Mock, former director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and co-founder of JSpace, an organization that represents left-leaning Zionists, said Harper's outspoken support of Israel "was a benefit to the Jews in that it made us feel better to hear our prime minister say the kinds of things that he did. But in my view, there was not a tangible benefit to Israel in terms of moving the peace process forward and enhancing her safety and security, enhancing negotiations with neighbours who are hostile, or enhancing the functioning of the UN in terms of our ability to negotiate."

She said Harper may also be remembered for the niqab controversy that stemmed from a 2011 Conservative government policy banning women from covering their faces while taking their citizenship oaths. Harper argued that it was a national security measure.

> Harper was seen as a great supporter of Israel, but also as a unique voice on the world stage, with many considering him the only world leader to put values before political calculations
> Dan Illouz, political strategist in Israel

"Mr. Harper went crazy over two women in 10 years who wanted to wear a niqab when swearing an oath, after being identified by the authorities, and having a microphone so they can hear it verbalized," said Mock, who ran unsuccessfully for the Liberals in Thornhill in 2011.

She added that if Harper has a legacy, in her opinion, it's not a positive one.

"The legacy is that some people felt good, but it's more a 'fallout,' because there was a fractiousness and divisiveness in the community, and now we need to embark on a healing process," she said.

"Pitting one group against another – that is the legacy of Harper. Pitting Jews against Jews, Muslims against Jews, Jews against Arabs."

Of course, there are many who disagree and will always be grateful to Harper for his steadfast, vocal support of Israel. In the hours following the election last week, Dan Illouz, a leading political strategist and analyst in Israel, and a former Canadian, started a campaign called, "The World Thanks Stephen Harper for his Leadership," with a goal of collecting 100,000 signatures.

"Harper was seen as a great supporter of Israel, but also as a unique voice on the world stage, with many considering him the only world leader to put values before political calculations," Illouz said.

"He stood up against ISIS, refused to automatically accept any nuclear deal with Iran and vocally opposed Russia's invasion of Ukraine. His principled foreign policy was said to have cost Canada a seat on the Security Council at the United Nations, but Harper said he never regretted it."

In two days, more than 12,200 people signed the online letter.

"Thank you for your steadfast support of Israel, for your opposition to radical Islam and to all other tyrannical regimes, and for your fight for freedom around the world and inside Canada," the letter said. ■

Thousands pay respects to Howie Rothman

Canadian-Israeli wounded in November 2014 synagogue attack dies of his injuries

Chaim (Howie) Yehiel Rothman

Canadian-Israeli Chaim (Howie) Yehiel Rothman, who died of injuries he sustained during a deadly terror attack at a Jerusalem synagogue almost a year ago, was laid to rest Oct. 24 in an emotional ceremony at the capital's Givat Shaul cemetery.

Thousands of friends, family and other members of the community paid their respects to Rothman, who had been in a coma ever since two east Jerusalem terrorists armed with a gun, axes and meat cleavers stormed the Bnei Torah Synagogue in Har Nof last November and attacked worshippers.

Toronto-born Rothman suffered a number of blows to his head from an axe when he tried to fight off the terrorists, his family said. Five others were killed in the attack – four worshippers and one policeman. The attackers were eventually killed in a shootout with police.

Rothman's death brings the death toll in the attack to six.

"He was an exceptional man, a devoted father and husband," his brother Steven Rothman, who lives in Toronto, told The CJN. "Everyone who knew him respected him and loved him. He always put everybody else ahead of himself. He is a man who didn't deserve this kind of a fate. He deserved to be on this earth a lot longer and to be able to do his good deeds."

Rothman said that when he visited his brother in January, they were encouraged by some improvements in his condition.

He was transferred to Beit Levenstein, a rehabilitation centre in Ra'anana in January.

"He was there for about six months. If anyone could have done something for him, it would have been the brain trauma centre at Beit Levenstein. After six months, they felt they couldn't do anything for him so he was moved back to the Herzog hospital in Jerusalem so he could be closer to the family and the Har Nof community," Rothman said.

"He wasn't making any progress at all. In fact, things were just slowly but surely getting worse for him. He came down with pneumonia and he was just getting all kinds of infection... he was just getting weaker and weaker."

Mourners at the funeral recited passages from the Book of Psalms before Bnei Torah's Rabbi Mordechai Hacohen Rubin eulogized the 55-year-old Rothman.

"It's been almost a year and our hearts are boiling again," Rubin said. "It's been a year since the attack and we cannot forget what our eyes have seen or return to a normal routine. Again death is at our window, as if the heavens are reminding us to 'remember, and not to forget,'" he said.

"Remember what Ishmael did to you," he added, evoking the biblical commandment to commemorate the atrocities committed against the Israelites by the Amalekites.

"The two villains slaughtered and shot people, leaving five widows and 35 orphans," he said.

Earlier that night, Howie Rothman's daughter Yaffa confirmed her father's death in an emotional Facebook post, and praised him for confronting the terrorists and saving others during the attack.

"Dad is gone... He was killed by animals lacking humanity," she wrote. "But he fought them, and saved other worshippers.

"May his memory be a blessing, and please, come join us in honouring the best man there is one final time," she wrote.

"He was a true servant of God, a happy Jew who always rushed to fulfil a mitzvah," one of the family's neighbours told Channel 10.

The ultra-Orthodox Har Nof neighbourhood where the attack occurred sits at the western edge of Jerusalem, and had been mostly shielded from the violence stemming from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that often wracks the capital.

The attackers stormed the synagogue shortly after 7 a.m. on Nov. 18, 2014, killing worshippers Rabbi Moshe Twersky, Aryeh Kupinsky, Rabbi Kalman Levine and Rabbi Avraham Shmuel Goldberg, along with policeman Zidan Saif.

Footage of the synagogue attack showed Saif – a traffic cop and one of the first to arrive at the scene – played a key role in ending the attack, firing from outside the synagogue at the terrorists inside, before one of them ran out and shot him at close range. The Druze officer was posthumously decorated with the Medal of Distinguished Service.

The attackers were Uday and Ghassan Abu Jamal, cousins from the east Jerusalem neighbourhood of Jabel Mukaber.

Rothman never regained consciousness after the attack.

His brother told The CJN the doctors called the family together to give them an opportunity to be at his side.

"Risa [his wife] and the children and my brother Jeff, who lives in the northern part of Israel, were called to be by his bedside along with some close members of the Har Nof community so they could say their goodbyes to him. Jeff called my mother, Molly [who lives in Toronto], and he put his cellphone beside Howie's ear so that my mother could say a few last words to him. It was very sad."

Steven Rothman said his mother travelled to Israel to sit shivah with the family, and he will join his family in Israel on Oct. 29.

He said he is currently in contact with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and One Family Fund to co-ordinate donations that community members can make to support Howie's family.

In the early days following the attack last November, with the help of federation and One Family Fund, about $100,000 was raised by the Toronto Jewish community. The Har Nof community also set up a fund and raised about $150,000 for the family.

"We're just so thankful for the things that people did in order to make his family's life a little more comfortable."

Chaim (Howie) Rothman, who immigrated to Israel 30 years ago, is survived by his wife, Risa, and 10 children.

Visitors to his hospital room said in recent weeks that he seemed to be aware of the people around him. His Canadian-born wife spent every day at his bedside. ■

Hamas may be directing terror attacks from Gaza

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

The message from the Islamist Hamas terror organization – directed more at the Palestinian people than Israel – is clear: We are a part of this "intifadah" and we aren't going anywhere.

While the group, which rules the Gaza Strip, has a less prominent presence in the Palestinian Authority-controlled West Bank, its voice is still being heard with recent attacks.

On Oct. 22, a Palestinian teenager stabbed a soldier in the Gush Etzion settlement bloc south of Jerusalem; a day later, two 20-year-olds stabbed an Israeli man after unsuccessfully attempting to board a school bus full of children in the central city of Beit Shemesh.

The latter two, after being shot by security forces, were both discovered to be wearing t-shirts reading "Izz ad-Din al-Qassam" – the name of Hamas's armed wing. All three attackers were from the Hebron-area village of Surif, and two of them – one in each incident – were named Ghanimat.

In recent years, all Hamas terror attacks in the West Bank have been directed and co-ordinated by the group's "West Bank bureau." The bureau is situated in Gaza and overseen by Hamas operatives originally from the West Bank who were deported to Gaza during the prisoner exchange for captured IDF soldier Gilad Shalit in 2011.

A Hamas shirt was worn by one of the two terrorists who were shot by police after attempting to carry out a stabbing attack in Beit Shemesh on Oct. 22. YAAKOV LEDERMAN/FLASH90

The bureau is headed by Abd el-Rahman Ghanimat and Mazen Fuqha, the former a member of the notorious "Surif squad" – a terrorist cell headed by Ibrahim Ghanimat that was responsible for a series of attacks against Israelis in the 1990s. Abd el-Rahman Ghanimat was serving five life sentences when he was released under the Shalit deal.

The Ghanimat connection between the commander in Gaza and the terrorists on the ground immediately raises suspicions these attacks were not a local "lone wolf" terror initiative, but rather were carried out on explicit instructions from their "cousin." However, this is only a suspicion at this point.

Israel's security establishment has no knowledge of Hamas giving specific instructions of this nature, although it's clear that the directive of the "West Bank bureau" in Gaza is to carry out as many attacks as possible against Israelis.

This directive is no secret. Hamas' calls for violence are made frequently and publicly on media outlets, but the group has refrained from urging attackers to carry out more severe terror attacks, like the campaign of suicide bombing attacks against Israelis during the second intifadah at the start of the millennium.

Website tracks time between terrorist attacks

ROBERT SWIFT
JERUSALEM

"Israel has been terror attack free for 7 Hours, 26 Minutes, 43 Seconds... 44 Seconds... 45 Seconds," the text and the ticking clock at the top of a new website proclaim. Below the header, a list of recent attacks against Israelis scroll by.

The website "Israel Has Been Terror Attack Free For" was set up by Australian-based software developer Ofer Zelig in response to a new wave of violent Palestinian attacks since the start of October.

"Terror attacks are not something too new to Israelis," but the nature of the hostilities has changed recently, Zelig told The Media Line. Attacks with knives and vehicles against Israelis have become so commonplace, so constant that people walking in the street are always looking over their shoulder, Zelig said. "It's so frequent that you can measure the time between attacks in hours not days," he explained.

So continuous are the reports of stabbings that news organizations are beginning to turn their attention to other subjects, the website's designer suggested, pointing to a similarity in the way in which Palestinian rocket attacks from the Gaza Strip into Israel were covered by journalists in the past.

"Rockets became so common that the media stopped reporting them – it's not news anymore, people stop talking about it," Zelig said. Now as people begin to adapt to the new threat the same thing is happening with the knife attacks.

In an effort to fight this tendency, Zelig created his website which was inspired by a similar page, "Israel Has Been Rocket Free For", which documents artillery launches from the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip. The aim is to give people outside Israel an idea of the frequency of attacks.

But in creating the website its designer had to acknowledge a moral question: What constitutes a terrorist attack? "I include every terror attack which has Israeli casualties," Zelig said, explaining that there are around a dozen other attacks each day which don't cause casualties, such as stone-throwing incidents, which are not included. Attacks against civilians and those against security forces are not differentiated for the purposes of the timer, nor is the geographic location of where an incident took place.

> It's so frequent that you can measure the time between attacks in hours not days

The website's information comes from Israeli media outlets, which Zelig said he found generally trustworthy, though for accuracy he always corroborates sources against each other.

When covering attacks by Israelis against Palestinians, Zelig acknowledged that he wondered what to do. "I want to be fair, I want to include this stuff – on the other hand every person needs to promote stuff that is happening to their side, not the other way around," Zelig said.

Other Israelis have found a more pleasant way to respond to the attacks. A new Facebook group called Eatifada – a play on the Arabic word intifadah – urges Israelis to eat at restaurants hard-hit by customers who are staying home because of the violence. The idea is for diners to take pictures of their meals and share them online to show their support and to encourage others to do the same.

"Out on the town...can't keep a good country down! #eatifada," Josh Sussman wrote on the group's Facebook feed. "Join the #Eatifada. The only proper Jewish response to terror!" Daniel Goldman, another patron suggested.

Food-based responses have also been the basis for a number of efforts aimed at promoting interfaith unity. In the north of the country, a group of Jewish citizens began handing out baked goods to Arab construction workers in their neighbourhood while holding a sign which read "Peace of cake," in English, Arabic, and Hebrew.

Elsewhere, a hummus restaurant owner in northern Israel attracted attention when he offered to provide a second helping for free to diners at any tables made up of a mix of Jewish and Arab customers. The restaurant owner, Kobi Tzafrir, said that some customers even declined the free offer and paid in full in order to show their support for the initiative. ■

Rivlin vows never to release Yitzhak Rabin's killer

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Marking the Hebrew 20-year anniversary of the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's President Reuven Rivlin said on Oct. 25 that he would never grant Rabin's killer a presidential pardon.

"As long as I am president, Yigal Amir will never be pardoned," Rivlin said. "May my right hand wither if I ever sign a pardon for that damned man."

Rabin was shot dead at the end of a peace rally on Nov. 4, 1995, by Amir, a right-wing extremist.

Addressing an annual memorial ceremony at the president's official residence in Jerusalem, Rivlin recalled a well-known satirical sketch by a comedy troupe, which aired shortly after Rabin's assassination. In the sketch, Amir, played by actor Rami Heuberger, delivers a monologue from inside a jail cell where he says, "I'll be pardoned in 20 years' time, and you all know it deep inside your heart."

The president said the sketch exposed the deep anxieties of left-wing Israelis at the time and also contributed to an atmosphere of delegitimization of the right.

Rivlin, who acknowledged that he disagreed with Rabin's approach toward rapprochement with the Palestinians, entailing territorial compromise, went on to warn that political violence erodes Israeli democracy, and encouraged Israelis to embrace one another's differences and promote shared values.

"The killer broke down a fence maintained by generations of Jews, and he may have left it broken," he said. "It's been 20 years since the murder, and we have to ask ourselves, 'Are we doing enough to seal what was breached by the murderer?'

"Are we doing enough to instill, again and again, awareness of the destructive potential of political violence?" Rivlin asked.

"We must ensure, for us and the next generations, that the day upon which we remember Rabin's murder will be a day belonging to all Israel – all its camps, all its sectors, a day of self-examination for the Israeli people, a time of self-examination for Israeli democracy," he said.

Rabin, a career soldier, served as Israel's chief of staff during the Six Day War in 1967 and was later appointed as the country's ambassador to the United States. In a second career, as a politician, he served as prime minister in the 1970s and 1990s and also held the post of defence minister for several years.

In 1994, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize – along with then-foreign minister Shimon Peres and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat – for his part in signing the Oslo peace accords a year earlier. ■

SO HOW DOES A SNOWBIRD GET A DIVORCE?

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 33 years

So it's that time of year again. Halloween? Black Friday? No. For some of you, its time to plan your annual sojourn to the southern climes. And if you're a senior with a place in the States like Florida, you may have already booked your flights. So what if a Snowbird lives part of the year in Canada, the other part in Florida, and then wants a divorce? Divorce among seniors increases every year, especially now that the baby boomers have begun collecting their pensions. The problem may occur if both spouses are Snowbirds or if the one remaining in Canada refuses to commence a divorce application. Why? Well, to obtain a divorce from a Canadian court a married person or his spouse must have been separated for at least one year (in most cases) and has to be resident at least 12 months prior to commencing the Divorce proceeding. If one starts the Divorce proceeding in Florida one of the parties to the marriage must reside 6 months in the State before the filing of the petition. Unlike in Canada, there is no "one year of separation" rule to be divorced in Florida, but one cannot be remarried in Canada without one of the spouses having resided in Florida for one year prior to commencing the Florida divorce application. Without a one year separation, the Florida divorce would not be recognized in Canada.

The simple solution might be that after one year of separation: (a) lie about your residency status when you see your Canadian lawyer by simply showing him/her documents about your ownership of property in Canada or rental agreement or (b) stay at least 6 months in Florida before coming back to Canada to commence your divorce petition in that state. However, if you lie you may be committing a criminal offence by signing court papers that are false. If your spouse opposes the divorce and challenges your statement about your residency you could be inviting trouble. So don't lie.

So what's wrong with simply commencing your divorce proceeding in Florida by continuing to reside there for 6 months? Too many early bird specials?

Well, residing in Florida and not returning to Canada for that length of time, except for brief breaks, may not be realistic for many reasons: work or academic commitments, family responsibilities, overall cost of staying that long, and for some, health insurance issues/costs.

Finally, if a spouse also has a claim for property division, support or parenting, these issues can still be decided in a Canadian court without commencing a divorce application and before the one year of separation ends. One does not have to commence a Canadian divorce application for any of these remedies. If necessary, one can commence a lawsuit for any relief in these areas, except for the divorce itself, which can always be applied for later once the year ends.

Like everything, it's complicated and depends on the facts. So what does a Snowbird to get a Divorce? He flies first to his lawyer before getting his boarding pass.

Hamas instructs West Bank supporters

Hamas "instructions" for their West Bank operatives to carry out stabbing and shooting attacks have been largely supported by the Palestinian public.

So far, Hamas in Gaza has not paid a price from Israel for its role in inciting and encouraging the ongoing surge in violence. The organization's leadership, however, understands that if the current spate of attacks becomes more deadly, Israel may respond by striking Hamas targets in Gaza, a development the Islamist group wishes to avoid. A return to the 2000-2001 modus operandi would probably come with a heavy price tag.

Hamas is succeeding in painting itself as responsible for starting the current uprising against Israel, citing the Oct. 1 terror attack in the West Bank in which Eitam and Naama Henkin were gunned down in their car in front of their children. Some analysts believe it is no coincidence the deadly shooting attack on the Henkins occurred just days after a series of unprecedented demonstrations against Hamas rule in the Strip.

According to Israeli and PA intelligence, Hamas, at least for now, lacks the military infrastructure to carry out suicide attacks in Israel from the West Bank.

> If the current spate of attacks becomes more deadly, Israel may respond by striking Hamas targets in Gaza

But both Israel and the PA understand that a military infrastructure capable of co-ordinating larger attacks could be developed, even under the radar of local intelligence gatherers. In other words, one cannot dismiss the possibility that terror operatives – and not necessarily Hamas – will try to carry out suicide bombing attacks against Israelis.

Currently, Islamic Jihad is the group most likely to try a large-scale attack. If Jihad operatives do manage to carry out a major terror attack, it would return the group to centre stage and a prominent place in Palestinian public opinion. ■

Netanyahu's Holocaust claim called 'inflammatory rhetoric'

JTA
WASHINGTON

The White House said Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's claim that a Palestinian leader came up with the idea for the Holocaust was part of a pattern of "inflammatory rhetoric" in the region.

"I don't think there's any doubt here at the White House who is responsible for the Holocaust that killed six million Jews," White House spokesman Eric Schultz said Oct. 22

"We here continue to stress publicly and privately that the importance of preventing inflammatory rhetoric, accusations or actions on both sides that can feed the violence. And we believe that inflammatory rhetoric needs to stop."

Netanyahu had said two days earlier that Hitler was planning only to deport the Jews until he met Grand Mufti of Jerusalem Haj Amin al-Husseini, a Palestinian nationalist, in 1941, and agreed to his plea to mass murder the Jews.

"Hitler didn't want to exterminate the Jews at the time, he wanted to expel the Jews," Netanyahu said in his Oct. 20 address to the World Zionist Congress. "And Haj Amin al-Husseini went to Hitler and said, 'If you expel them, they'll all come here.' 'So what should I do with them?' he asked. He said, 'Burn them.'"

An array of Holocaust historians immediately debunked the claim, noting the mufti's relatively minor role in the Holocaust and that the Final Solution was already underway when Hitler and the mufti met in Berlin in 1941. Additionally, a transcript of the meeting does not reflect Netanyahu's account.

Germany's government refuted the claim as well just prior to a meeting between Netanyahu and the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, and Palestinian leaders and the Israeli opposition accused Netanyahu of distorting the past for political gain.

Netanyahu later said he did not mean to imply that Hitler and Nazi Germany were not responsible for the Holocaust, but hewed to his claim that al-Husseini played a major role in the Holocaust.

The White House reaction comes after Secretary of State John Kerry met Netanyahu in Berlin and urged Palestinians and Israelis to halt all incitement. ■

Muzsikás performs Hungarian folk music that was all but lost in the Holocaust.

Concert features recovered music of prewar Hungary

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The lost Jewish music of Transylvania will be the focus of a Nov. 5 concert at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, featuring the acclaimed Hungarian folk ensemble Muzsikás.

More accurately, the music drills down even deeper than Transylvania, a region rich in Hungarian language and culture now wholly within Romania.

Presented by the Ashkenaz Foundation as part of Holocaust Education Week, the concert will focus mainly on the recently recovered folk music of the region of Máramaros, once home to 5,000 Jewish families.

The music, along with the families, all but vanished in the Holocaust. So the concert may aptly be called aural history.

The classically trained quartet, formed in 1973, will play a variety of instruments native to the region and are slated to be joined by soloist singer Agnes Herczku.

In its early years, the group was at the forefront of Budapest's tanchaz (dance-house) scene, and a roots music revival grew to national levels.

After the fall of communism in Hungary and Romania in the late 1980s, members undertook a challenging mission: find and preserve the Jewish music of Transylvania, and specifically of the northeastern Carpathian region of Máramaros, which today straddles Romania and Ukraine but where Hungarian culture was once dominant.

The sounds, meantime, were not quite klezmer, not quite Gypsy, and the drive to preserve them was not driven by personal imperative. None of the band members are Jewish.

"We admire Jewish culture and we got involved as though we got an inheritance, that it's our duty to collect and to make some memory of the lost Jewish tradition of peasant music of Hungary," Muzsikás member Daniel Hamar explains in a telephone interview from Hungary.

Hamar calls the music the band plays "traditional Hungarian village music" and "traditional Hungarian village Jewish music. We would like to show there isn't much difference between the two."

He explains: "A peasant farmer creates a special type of culture. There were very few people in Europe who could be Jewish and a farmer because Jews could not buy land, except in Transylvania."

So the region became a Petri dish in which Jews formed a peasant class and created a unique musical legacy.

"For centuries, Jews were the musicians of Transylvania, and only in the 19th century were they replaced by Gypsies," Hamar says.

When band members travelled the region, "we collected Jewish music but didn't find any Jewish musicians. So it's very tragic but a very typical story of eastern Europe. The culture survived but the people didn't."

The music they encountered "was extraordinary, something we never heard before. It completely changed our lives.

"The local musicians use a different technique than in classical. All of us are trained classical musicians. When we heard a violin, viola or bass, it was completely different than what we were used to in classical music. So we learned how to play, what the technique was and, most important, how to improvise. It was a new language for us."

Band members were encouraged by the Hungarian composers Zoltan Kodaly and Bela Bartok, who also collected and transcribed folk music. Hamar says there are some 200,000 recordings of folk and related music in the archives of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences.

"But it's very difficult to learn this music just by listening," he said.

Hamar himself plays double bass, a gardon, which resembles a cello but is played percussively like a drum, and something called "Jewish drums," best experienced live.

The music, he says, is reflective of the Jewish experience in the region: By turns "happy and something one would play at a funeral." ■

A keen eye vs. a sharp tongue

Evelyn Tauben

Following Yom Kippur, social media flooded with indignation over a major mix-up at a Chicago news station that botched a well-intentioned effort to acknowledge the Jewish holiday. The image illustrating the report was of the yellow star that Nazis forced Jews to wear, complete with the German word "Jude" on a background of a concentration camp uniform.

After days of online vitriol, the president of the New York Board of Rabbis, Rabbi David Seth Kirshner, appealed to his network, sharing the apology issued by the broadcasters: "In the wake of a holiday about forgiveness, I humbly suggest we as a community accept the apology and stop circulating the picture and story. It was clearly a mistake, and to turn it into a viral anti-Semitic tirade, is a futile exercise."

While I concur, the question remains: "How did this happen?" The answer lies not in nefarious anti-Jewish sentiment, but in an epidemic of increasingly impoverished visual literacy, affecting even those in the business of disseminating images.

Over the course of history, forms, colours and symbols gather potent meaning.

I worked with a designer who submitted a clean, modern proposal for a conference poster; but in the combination of colour and form, I saw an echo of the pink triangle and requested a redesign. She obliged with the implication that I was overreacting, which I suspect was due in part to her lack of awareness that the pink triangle represented Nazi persecution of homosexuals.

On another marketing campaign for programs about contemporary Russian Jewish culture, I cautioned the designer against using red as the signature colour. Because, red plus Russia means something, especially to the Russian audiences we were targeting.

Over the course of history, forms, colours and symbols gather potent meaning. It's our responsibility to be able to "read" the signs of all cultures, not just our own. Hammer plus sickle means something. Star plus crescent means something. For Jews, blue plus white connotes tradition, the tallit, Israel itself. "Kachol v'lavan" is ubiquitous among Jewish organizations, trading creative experimentation for the significance suffused in the enduring colour combination.

Even when The CJN launched its long-awaited redesign in 2014, it did not depart from the predictable colour scheme. It's a welcome change when Jewish organizations push into new imaginative terrain. I support the intentions of another newspaper to diverge from "the traditional blue that anchored the Forward for years," as editor-in-chief Jane Eisner explained this past spring regarding the Forward's redesign process. The results, however, are disappointing.

Of their colour choice, Eisner wrote: "Gold is the emblem of excellence dating back to biblical times. And America was the Goldene Medina for the founders of the Forward." Eisner can call their new logo "gold" until she's Israeli-flag blue in the face but when I read the Forward online, all I see are yellow icons against a black banner – a stark, uninviting colourscape with a palette similar to the image that launched a firestorm at the Chicago broadcasters.

It would be absurd to suggest that a great Jewish newspaper has a covert anti-Semitic agenda any more than Chicago's WGN does; yet the choice of so-called gold on black is nearly as myopic as that Yom Kippur misstep. When paired, these colours trigger a series of historical associations and their usage suggests a befuddling disconnect from that reality.

When those whose very role it is to disseminate ideas and images demonstrate a lack of awareness of the iconography of our times, it is highly disconcerting. However, instead of merely attacking the media, the Jewish community, which places a premium on critical thinking and advanced study, should equally promote enhanced visual literacy both within the Jewish world and without.

Visual acumen is becoming ever more essential as both the public and the private spheres are flooded with imagery where even credible sources prompt close scrutiny. It behooves us all to absorb this barrage of visual information with a discriminating and sensitive eye, informed by history and global currents. ■

Toronto actor and playwright explores themes of identity

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For her latest onstage role, Toronto-based actor Aviva Armour-Ostroff might wear a corset for a play set in 1885. But the themes she helps bring to life in this piece of theatre resonate loudly today.

In Age of Arousal, which opened on Oct. 25 at the Factory Theatre, Armour-Ostroff is Virginia Madden, one of three sisters.

The play, by late renowned Canadian playwright, Linda Griffiths, and directed by the award-winning Jennifer Brewin, is set in Victorian London and explores feminism and sexuality against the backdrop of the suffragist movement.

Yet, Armour-Ostroff knows that these ideas are just as relevant now. "There's still a fight for equality," she says. Though she recognizes that we have made progress.

"We're definitely allowed to wear pants in public," she says. "We're allowed to cross our legs and we're allowed to smoke and we're allowed to be single and we're allowed to own our own money and be businesswomen."

Yet, on many television shows, for instance, she sees women pigeonholed to certain roles. She also knows that many of us still make assumptions about women and the positions we're supposed to hold in society.

As for Armour-Ostroff, she jumps in and out of numerous roles in the arts world. This year alone, she received a Dora Award nomination for her work in Moment with the Actors Repertory Company. She also won the Patrick Conner Award, given to an individual dedicated to theatre and sustainability.

For eight years, Armour-Ostroff ran the Lab Cab Festival along with her producing partner, André du Toit. Lab Cab started out as a cabaret fundraiser for the Factory Theatre and grew into a weekend-long arts celebration.

Eventually, she and du Toit held it in Toronto's Parkdale neighbourhood where it ran until 2014. Lab Cab was a free, family-friendly event that made the arts accessible while also allowing artists to showcase their work. "People were seeing music and theatre and dance and film and visual art that they would never on their own volition go and seek out," says Armour-Ostroff.

While she's proud of the festival, she decided to retire it last year in order to focus on other facets of her career.

Aviva Armour-Ostroff

> Writing comes out of necessity

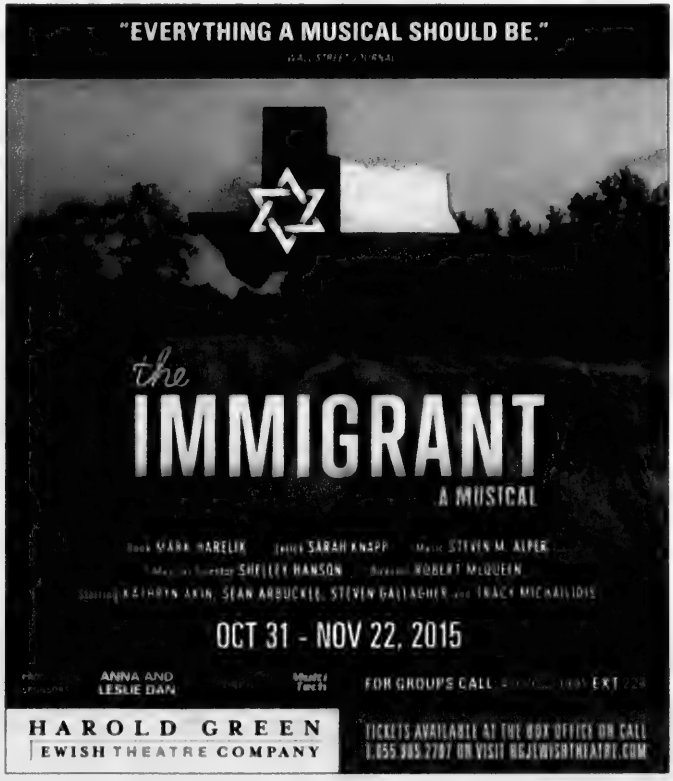
She's currently writing a play called Lune about a mother and daughter who must navigate the Canadian mental health-care system after the mother is diagnosed with bipolar disorder. The mother, a Jewish journalist, has a manic episode while reporting from South Africa in 1994.

Armour-Ostroff says it's based on her father and his experience as a South African Jewish man who was politically active around the same time.

"Writing comes out of necessity," she says. Lune will be her first play. "I was lying in bed one night going, 'I want to play this kind of character. I want her to be fierce, yet vulnerable. I want to be able to scream and cry. Oh, I want to play my dad.' That role is not going to get handed to you," she continues.

She notes that Lune explores themes of identity, and in a similar vein, so too does her character in Age of Arousal. In the play, she wrestles with alcoholism and strives to reconcile her outward personality with her inner self. "That's something that I think everyone struggles with and relates to." ■

Age of Arousal runs until Nov. 8 at the Factory Theatre in Toronto. For tickets call 416-504-9971 or visit factorytheatre.ca.



Jewish book awards carries on under new stewardship

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A new chapter of the Canadian Jewish Literary Awards opened on Oct. 18 as about 150 people gathered in an auditorium at York University in north Toronto for an awards ceremony to honour nine award-winning books and authors.

Top fiction prize went to Nora Gold for Fields of Exile, her well-crafted, dystopic novel of campus life when anti-Semitism, via an anti-Israel apartheid campaign, rears its persistent ugly head.

In her brief acceptance speech, Gold said she hoped the novel would bring about some positive change in the world, even though "the idea of trying to effect social change through literature is heretical" to literary critics, she observed.

"Maybe I thought the magic of literature could work its magic here and help open some hearts and minds – I hope so still," she said.

Alison Pick won the biography/memoir prize for her memoir Between Gods, a moving account of reclaiming her Jewish identity after her family's post-Holocaust conversion to Christianity.

"My ancestors died in Auschwitz and my Judaism was gone," Pick said. "Now, with this book, a new Jewish family was formed."

Other winners included Suri Rosen, who won in the youth literature category for her book Playing with Matches; Robyn Sarah, who took the poetry prize for her collection My Shoes Are Killing Me; and Ruth Panofsky, who took the Yiddish prize for The Collected Poems of Miriam Waddington: A Critical Edition. (Waddington was a lifelong Yiddishist who translated many Yiddish poems into English).

Although described as an inaugural event, the afternoon ceremony felt very much like a seamless continuation of the 27-year-old annual book awards that retired professor Adam Fuerstenberg founded in Toronto in 1988. (An honorary jury member, Fuerstenberg sat at the back of the hall, watching the proceedings like a proud grandparent.)

The Koffler Centre of the Arts took over administration of the awards in recent years, but when the Koffler announced a hiatus – putting the awards "on the shelf," so to speak – several jury members decided to carry on the tradition under new auspices.

Nora Gold at the awards evening.

Jury chair Edward Trapunski thanked the Koffler for its excellent "stewardship" of the awards, but said that jury members were concerned that some books wouldn't get the recognition they deserved if there had been a hiatus.

"If a book comes out in a year when there are no awards, then that book has lost its chance forever," he said.

Host of the resurrected awards is the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, whose former director, CJN columnist Sara Horowitz, is part of the seven-member book awards jury. The value of prizes given out during the afternoon was "the most ever for any Jewish book awards" in Canada, Trapunski said.

Other prize winners were Joseph Hodes, who won in the history category for his study of the Bene Israel Jews of India, From India to Israel: Identity, Immigration, and the Struggle for Religious Identity; Beverley Chalmers, who won in the Holocaust Literature category for Birth, Sex and Abuse: Women's Voices Under Nazi Rule; and James A. Diamond, who won in the Scholarship category for Maimonides and the Shaping of the Jewish Canon.

Mireille Silcoff took the short fiction prize for her short-story collection Chez l'Arabe, partially written at a time when illness caused her to lose her speaking voice. "In truth, my voice had not disappeared but had moved inward into these stories," she said. ■

U.S. diplomat Dennis Ross to highlight Winnipeg festival

MYRON LOVE

Winnipeg's sixth annual Tarbut: Festival of Jewish Culture has scored a major coup in bringing prominent American diplomat Dennis Ross to headline the event, which takes place this year Nov. 14 to 22.

Ross will be in Winnipeg on Nov. 15, to speak about his new book, Doomed to Succeed: the U.S.-Israeli Relationship from Truman to Obama.

"We are thrilled to have Ambassador Ross as part of our exciting lineup," says Tamar Barr, Rady JCC's assistant executive director.

"Our Winnipeg audiences have come to expect the best in entertainment at Tarbut, and this year is no exception."

For 12 years, Ross played a leading role in shaping American involvement in the Middle East peace process, Barr notes. He was the point man in negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians for both former presidents George H. W. Bush and Bill Clinton.

Tarbut evolved from the long-standing Jewish Book Fair, which took place at the Asper campus for many years. Six years ago, the Rady JCC – which had long been charged with organizing the weeklong book fair – decided to change the format of the yearly event and expand its mandate. Authors are still featured, and many books and Jewish crafts are still on display, but the program has been enhanced with concerts by Israeli and other performers, comedy, Jewish-themed movies and an exhibit featuring the art of Winnipeg Jewish artists.

Other featured authors are American Nomi Eve, whose latest novel, Henna House, portrays the traditions and customs of Yemenite Jewry in mid-20th century; and local authors David Matas, reading from his recent autobiography, and Danita Aziza reading from her latest book, Finding Home: A Journey of Life Lessons in the Land of Israel.

The musical portion of Tarbut kicks off on opening night with popular local bandleader Ron Paley and his band doing a tribute to modern Jewish singer-composers Billy Joel, Neil Diamond, Neil Sedaka, Barry Manilow and Bette Midler.

"We are very excited to also have, from Israel, Baladino, performing Ladino music, and Pharaoh's Daughter," American Basya Schechter and her band playing pieces based on traditional prayers and poems from the liturgy, Barr says.

The films being screened at Tarbut this year are Hunting Elephants, an Israeli heist caper comedy starring Patrick Stewart; and Dough, a humorous British film about the relationship between an elderly Jewish baker and his assistant, a young Muslim from Darfur in western Sudan.

"Tarbut has become the pre-eminent arts event in the community, garnering more and more attention each and every year," Barr says. "We drew more than 3,200 people last year and expect to better that number this year."

Tarbut also receives funding and support from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, the Consulate General of Israel, the Rabbi Rappaport Education and Lecture Series Trust and other local corporate sponsors and private individuals. ■

Musical based on true immigrant's story

JODIE SHUPAC

Robert McQueen has directed his share of musicals, but he was struck by the unique intimacy of The Immigrant, a production he's directing for the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company.

"It's lovely because it's a real sort of chamber musical – which are pretty hard to come by – there's a small cast, a compelling story and it's very simple in form," McQueen said. "When you find them, they're really worth exploring."

Running Oct. 31 to Nov. 22, the musical version of The Immigrant, which premiered as an off-Broadway production in 2004, is based on Mark Harelik's 1985 play about a young Jewish immigrant who flees Russia in 1909 and ends up in the small Baptist community of Hamilton, Texas.

McQueen speculated that Harelik pushed to turn the original play into a musical in order to give the material "a second life."

The music is composed by Steven M. Alper, with lyrics by Sarah Knapp and musical direction by Shelley Hanson.

Harelik based the story on the experiences of his grandparents, Haskell and Matleh Harelik, who were the product of what was known as the Galveston Plan. This immigrant assistance program, operated by several Jewish organizations between 1907 and 1914, was set up to divert Jews fleeing Russia and eastern Europe from crowded eastern seaboard cities like New York and Philadelphia and disperse them across the United States.

Though in real life, Haskell and Matleh escaped the pogroms of eastern Europe at the turn of the century and settled in Galveston, Texas; in the fictionalized account, Haskell, the protagonist of the musical, played by Sean Arbuckle, wanders farther afield from Galveston into the interior of Texas.

He reaches Hamilton, a town of just over 1,000 people, and decides to stay.

McQueen noted that the script makes no mention of other Jews coming to live in the town.

In the play – as in real life – Haskell, who starts out as a vendor wielding a banana cart, is taken in by a Texan couple, Milton and Ima Perry, played by Steven Gallagher and Kathryn Akin, who are compelled, out of a sense of Christian charity, to help the stranger, despite their concerns about discovering he is Jewish.

Milton, a banker, cannot help but be moved by Haskell's sense of optimism and a friendship blooms between them as he helps Haskell launch his career.

With his assistance, Haskell advances to operating a horse-drawn fruit cart and eventually to opening a successful department store.

He ultimately brings his wife Leah, played by Tracy Michailidis, over from Russia to join him.

McQueen said the play, which spans a lengthy period, from 1917 until 1943, moves from being a classic immigrant story to focusing on the relationships of and between the two couples.

"At the beginning of the play it's a huge thing for the Texan couple when they realize Haskell is both Russian and Jewish. But it becomes about people discovering commonalities and ways to coexist – to find each other in ways that transcend the things that make us different," McQueen noted.

Based in New York City, McQueen, who is originally from Western Canada, has previously directed plays for Toronto's Acting Up Stage Company, run by artistic and managing director Mitchell Marcus, as well as for the Canadian Opera Company and Vancouver Opera.

He's relished working on The Immigrant, as it's given him the opportunity to dive into researching stories of the real Harelik's life, as well as lives of immigrants like him.

"You can find an immigrant story in any family. We've been focusing on revealing the richness of this particular story through these four very strong actors," McQueen said. ■

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A theatre without a home will bring its first shows to Toronto's Jewish community next month.

"A 'wandering theatre' means we don't have our venue," said Joseph Fackenheim, artistic director of Aspaklaria Jewish Repertory Theatre.

"We'll go to anywhere with a stage, and it doesn't even have to have a stage... Synagogues, community centres, various organizations, as long as they have a venue for us to perform. The way that we're built, we cater to these audiences, to travel, to be adaptable to various places."

The season will begin at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on Nov. 14, with Dead End, which analyzes intergenerational communication via the story of a runaway girl.

Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto in Thornhill has also committed to a show, probably later next month and probably featuring the same play.

Founded in Israel 15 years ago, Aspaklaria is Israel's only repertory or government-supported theatre company exclusively dedicated to Jewish themes and culture. It has produced more than 40 plays over its 15-year history and boasts over 300 performances per year.

In Toronto, it will join a theatre scene that already has the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company and the Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre, which plans to return for the 2016-2017 season after a one-year hiatus. But Aspaklaria's leadership sees its touring model complementing, not threatening, the established players.

Joseph Fackenheim

> There are a lot of Jewish theatre groups in North America, but a lot of them aren't doing what we do- original plays.

Talks are underway for performances in other Canadian cities – Montreal and Vancouver are top of mind – and U.S. dates could follow.

For Fackenheim, who has performed with the group for the past six years, the project represents a kind of homecoming. His father, Emil Fackenheim, was the rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple and a professor of philosophy at the University of Toronto. When Joseph was three, the family moved to Israel.

Years later, the family name has triggered memories and opened doors, as Joseph launches Aspaklaria's North America beachhead.

"I had a phone call today from a shul that's interested," he recalled last week. "'Fackenheim' – that name rings a bell. You're not related by any chance to Prof. Emil Fackenheim?"

The theatre aims to bring to North America the Jewish arts mélange that it has developed in Israel.

"There are a lot of Jewish theatre groups in North America," he said, "but a lot of them aren't doing what we do – original plays. They're not so much doing the laboratory aspect of trying to see what happens when you put Jewish culture together with theatre."

Fackenheim also plans to stage Torn, about the young son of a prominent Conservative rabbi. Grappling with questions of faith, he ventures downtown one Friday night, and the play follows his journey into the night.

In addition, he said, the theatre will commission new work – on the BDS movement, for example, which advocates boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel.

Askpaklaria's "laboratory" nature also means that it observes Jewish law.

"We looked into the halachic implications," he said, "and we found out that it is okay to learn lines on Shabbat but it's not okay to rehearse, to do anything that involves work. And even me – I don't keep Shabbat, but I don't do anything to do with the theatre on Shabbat, because I respect that. I believe that my word is my bond in this case."

The company's adherence to Jewish law has allowed it to penetrate markets in Israel that rarely experience theatre. Some Orthodox communities, for example, observe a range of restrictions regarding female actors. Aspaklaria addresses this concern by featuring only male performers or, in female-only productions, allowing only women in the audience.

"More liberal streams are also accepting," Fackenheim said, "because the way that we investigate these things, and the new ways to approach old tenets of belief, are very interesting to other streams as well."

He first developed a passion for the arts as a teenager, seeing in them a vehicle to explore life's deepest questions.

"I have a complicated relationship with [Jewish tradition] personally," he said, "and I think the best way for me to examine my connection with my beliefs, my culture, is through this, on stage with other artists and my audience."

About 50 years ago, his father became famous by formulating the so-called 614th commandment: not to hand Hitler "posthumous victories" by abandoning Jewish heritage.

Asked if Aspaklaria satisfies his father's dictate, Fackenheim fils gave a long, knowing laugh: "I believe so, it is fair to say that."■

Israeli tennis coach and Jewish player lead Canada

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There was definitely an Israeli touch to Canada winning its historic first Junior Davis Cup in tennis for boys 16 and under on Oct. 4 in Spain.

Led by 16-year-old Denis Shapovalov of Richmond Hill, Ont. who was born in Tel Aviv, and Canadian Junior Davis Cup captain/coach Oded Jacob, an Israeli who formerly worked with the Israel Tennis Association, Canada, went undefeated in teams from Colombia, Czech Republic, Germany, Great Britain, Hong Kong and Poland in a round robin competition to win its first Junior Davis Cup.

Shapovalov shined in the final tie against Germany. The tall 5-foot 10 in. lefthander defeated German Marvin Moeller 6-1, 6-4 to give Canada a 1-0 lead. After Canadian teammate Felix Auger-Aliassime lost his match to even the tie, the two Canadian boys teamed in doubles in the final match to emerge victorious with a 6-3, 3-6, 6-2 win over the German duo of Nicola Kuhn and Moeller.

"It's very exciting being the first Canadians ever to win Junior Davis Cup," said a jubilant Shapovalov, ranked 29th among the world's top juniors, following the historic win.

"Being the top seed, I am proud of what our boys accomplished. The competition was fierce over the six-day competition and I am glad to be part of the historical win for Canada," said Jacob, who was hired by Tennis Canada in 2011 to develop top Canadian junior players based in Vancouver.

Players from 47 nations took part in the regional competition in 2015 leading to the top 16 teams competing in the final week in Spain.

Many of the top professional players, such as Roger Federer and Rafael Nadal, competed in Junior Davis Cup when they were teens.

"Our victory shows how far Canada has come in tennis. Canadians are no longer just talented in hockey and figure skating. We have an impressive tennis system in place that other nations wish to emulate," said Jacob.

Tennis Canada feels that hiring Jacob was one of the best moves made to develop promising Canadian tennis players in Western Canada.

"We are fortunate to have hired one of the best coaches in the world to identify talented youngsters in tennis", said Ryan Clark, chief executive of Tennis BC in Vancouver, who selected Jacob over other top candidates available.

Jacob has been held in high esteem in tennis circles for his stellar achievements in Israel. He nurtured Israeli tennis players Shahar Peer, Dudi Sela and Harel Levy from their teens into top world class players over the past 15 years.

Jacob was instrumental in achieving several high milestones for Israel. Two players he developed – Peer and Sela – led Israel to a World Group Fed Cup berth in 2008, and the 2009 Davis Cup semi-finals respectively.

Ironically enough, Jacob may again be taking an Israeli born tennis player, albeit now a Canadian, and help Shapovalov become a top tennis player.

Shapovalov has already produced an impressive resumé. He teamed with Auger-Aliassime to win the 2015 U.S. Open Junior doubles championship. Last April as a 15-year-old, Shapovalov won the Rogers Canadian national tennis championship. He was also named by Tennis Canada as the 2014 Junior Tennis Player Of The Year.

Shapovalov has joined Canadians Milos Raonic and Vasek Pospisil as winners of the prestigious national junior championship.

Winning the national junior title does not mean that Shapovalov is guaranteed to be a top tennis star for Canada on the pro circuit in a few years.

"At age 15, Milos Raonic was not the top Canadian as he is now. So, you never hope how good a young player can be on the pro circuit," said Jacob.

Shapovalov's parents are Russian Jews who emigrated to Israel before emigrating again to Toronto in 2004.

He credits his mother Tessa, who coached young Denis at five years old, for his love of tennis.

"She even opened up her own tennis club (Tessatennis) in Vaughan to give me a base to train in tennis," said Shapovalov.

Although he would probably earn a scholarship to an American university with a tennis program, Shapovalov is thinking of bypassing college to turn pro.

"My dream has always been to be a top tennis player and winning Grand Slam tournaments, so I probably won't go to college," said Shapovalov. ■

Art! Food for the soul

Recently, patrons of the Koffler Gallery were treated to the first solo show in Canada of British-Spanish artist filmmaker Isabel Rocamora. Rocamora's latest work, a three channel film called Faith (2015), contemplates the conflict among the three dominant religions in Jerusalem, seeking a common ground in the gesture of prayer and its essential humanity.

Meanwhile, the Lonsdale Gallery had a reception for artist Pedie Wolfond. In her exhibit, Whiteout, Wolfond begins with a carefully planned and colourful painting, then applies thin and thick layers of white paint igniting a new gesture which highlights moments of focused energy, an indulgence for the eyes and the soul. ■

When should a first date progress to a second?

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

I hate first dates, and I've had quite a few lately. What's with all the shtick men have now? The first guy seemed normal online and on the phone. We went for dinner and everything was going well, until he reached over and picked up a bunch of fries off my plate. The next guy barely took his eyes off his phone as his annoying text message alert kept interrupting our conversation. I couldn't help feel the texts were about me. The third guy was clearly not over his ex and couldn't stop discussing what a bitch she was. All deal-breakers in my book.

Isn't there anyone left out there that's normal! I'm so frustrated I could scream. How am I ever going to meet Mr. Right?

Hates Dating

Dear Hates Dating,

Dating is all about the risks and the rewards. You have no choice but to put yourself out there in order to progress that first date into a second one.

The first impression someone makes may not convey who they really are as a potential partner. You're meeting a superficial being on the first date, someone who might be nervous, trying to put forward a specific persona, or trying too hard to impress you. On the other hand, he may truly be a jerk and not dating for the same reasons you are.

Time to put your Sherlock hat on and follow your instincts. It's not easy, and you have to be smart.

Here are some questions to ask yourself to determine if that first date should turn into a second.

First and foremost, do you feel safe, not only physically, but emotionally? Is he well-mannered, not putting you down or making you feel inadequate? Do you have anything in common? Does he possess any of the qualities from your short list? Are you bored? Are you enjoying yourself, or is the date a chore? Is your conversation easy or strained? Catching him in a lie is also a huge red flag. Trust your instincts.

Even if he did or said something annoying, if he passes most of the questions I mentioned, give a second date a try. Give yourselves a chance to let your hair down and get to know each other with the first date jitters and awkwardness out of the way. It only takes one to make it all the way to being that Mr. Right.

Dear Ella,

I recently met a sweet fellow at a party. He asked me out on a date, and I happily accepted. We were out for a walk after a lovely dinner, and he mentioned he would prefer to date women who have children. He is recently divorced and has two daughters 12 and 15.

At first I just thought it was an odd thing to say, but he explained that he didn't feel a woman who has never raised children would understand that he has to put his kids first. I don't have kids, and therefore don't meet his criteria, but I like this guy and his values. Do you think I should bother trying to pursue him, and change his mind?

Kidless & Single

Dear Kidless & Single,

I think on the surface, this fellow is admirable. First, his priority is his daughters, which tells me he is a hands-on dad. Second, he is being honest with you from the start, also an commendable trait.

The question then turns to you. Are you comfortable taking second place in this relationship right from the start? He is telling you that you will never be No. 1. Can you handle that? Is that what you want?

I think what he really needs is time to adjust to his new lifestyle and experience what it's like to be in the dating world again. He needs to stop being judgmental if he wants to succeed. Being a mother is not the only criteria that makes a woman understanding. There are plenty of divorced mothers who are ready to be No. 1 one in their man's life, and there are plenty of single childless women, who may even want to get to know his kids and be part of their lives.

Although this guy may have his priorities straight, his narrow-minded views tell me he's not ready for the dating scene yet. He has growing and learning to do. Are you sure you want to be the one to teach it to him? ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Rabbi Ilan Acoca says the Torah's ideals can help us regain our humility
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explains the importance of welcoming guests
Rabbi Catharine Clark offers lessons from the classic story of the binding of Isaac

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Rabbi Meir Simcha Hacohen explains that there is absolute good and good that would only be considered good in relationship to evil. Abraham, the pillar of kindness, requested of HaShem that even if there could only be found 50 people in Sodom who would be considered righteous when compared to the rest of the evil city, their merit should save everyone else.

This concept is important to remember in two instances. If you are very idealistic and a perfectionist and, therefore, feel like a failure because you are not on the high level you wish you were on, remember that in relation to the majority of the world, you are probably righteous. This will prevent you from becoming discouraged. But if you look around and see that other people are on such a low level that you begin to feel arrogant, focus on where you stand in absolute terms. When you view your present state in relation to the highest Torah ideals, you will be able to regain feelings of humility.

As human beings, we often think we have the answers to many of the world's issues. However, we have to ask ourselves, are we really in control? On the other hand, our rabbis order us to take a stand and not to be apathetic.

The challenge we have is to find a fine balance between these two extremes.

How do we do that?

When I am in that situation, I turn to God for guidance, and since God has all the answers, He guides me.

Let us all open our vessel which is the soul that God gave us. By doing so, God will be able to penetrate, show us the way and give us the answers we are looking for. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Something remarkable yet ordinary occurs at the beginning of this Torah portion. Initially, we are told, "HaShem appeared to [Abraham] by the oak trees of Mamre. He was sitting at the entrance of the tent as the day grew hot." Then the Torah reports, "Looking up, [Abraham] saw three men standing near him." (Genesis 18.1-2). First God appears, then there are three visitors. What happened to God?

James Kugel suggests that this is a "moment of confusion," when God morphs into three men.

Later – after the meal of hospitality, after the news about the future son and after Sarah has laughed – God is present again to ask, "Why did Sarah laugh?"

Sarah is frightened, because in a "moment of recognition," she has figured out with whom she is speaking. Kugel theorises that the Bible experienced the proximity of divine and human not as remarkable, but as an ordinary occurrence. God and humanity were not so distinct as they are today – the curtain that divides us would occasionally be pulled aside.

The Torah continues: "As soon as [Abraham] saw them, he ran from the entrance of the tent to greet them and, bowing to the ground, he said, 'My lords, if it please you, do not go on past your servant. Let a little water be brought. Bathe your feet and recline under the tree. Let me fetch you a morsel of bread to refresh yourselves, then go on…'"

Reading these words, a midrash imagines something quite notable: Abraham runs from God to the visitors. From this, we learn that "welcoming guests is more important that welcoming the Presence of God." Rabbi Shai Held proposes that this remarkable act has ordinary implications. If human beings are the icons of the divine, made "in the image of God," then by welcoming people, we also recognize and honour God. ■

The Binding of Isaac is a haunting story made all the more terrifying by an echo of its beginning at the end of the tale.

The story begins with God calling to Abraham by his name, "Abraham!" Once he has Abraham's attention, God continues with the horrible command that Abraham sacrifice his beloved son Isaac.

At the end of the story, when Abraham's knife is extended over his bound son, Abraham is called again by his name. This time, an angel of the Lord is the speaker, and he calls the name twice, "Abraham! Abraham!"

For centuries, commentators have asked why Abraham was called once to sacrifice his son but twice to halt his hand. Rashi gives the most comforting of answers. Calling Abraham's name two times is the language of endearment, as if the angel had said, "Abraham, sweetie!" To Rashi, it is as if God knew what horror Abraham had suffered and was consoling him. Ibn Ezra sees the action at Mount Moriah proceeding quickly. The angel calls Abraham's name twice because he is frantic to stop him before it is too late.

The Haketav Vehakabbalah, a 19th-century German commentary, envisions Abraham in a way that shocks most modern Jews. To him, Abraham is so intent on fulfilling the word of his Creator that Abraham could not hear the angel at first. The angel had to call Abraham's name a second time to distract the patriarch from what Abraham felt was the sacred task of killing Isaac.

Our reaction to the Haketav Vehakabbalah's interpretation reminds us that our paths – even those that may seem God-given – may not be as righteous as we think. Before acting too intently, we should listen to hear if our name is being called a second time. ■

For something different, add fresh figs

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Plump, soft and sweet, fresh figs are gorgeous in salads, desserts or simply enjoyed on their own.

Here is a simple chicken salad, for example. Give it a Mediterranean flavour by tossing in fresh figs, and since the salad's ingredients include yogurt (non-dairy), mint and chickpeas, too, the finished dish can seem positively Greek.

Also, remember that after the fresh fig season, you can still make these dishes with dried figs.

Fig and pistachio couscous

- ❑ 1 1/2 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 box (10 oz.) couscous
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups figs, thinly sliced
- ❑ 1 1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. ground allspice
- ❑ 1/2 cup shelled pistachios, chopped
- ❑ 1/4 cup chopped green onions
- ❑ 1/4 cup thinly sliced fresh basil

Combine 2 1/4 cups water, oil and salt in medium saucepan; bring to boil. Remove from heat; stir in couscous, figs, and spices. Cover; let stand until water is absorbed, about 5 minutes. Transfer to a large bowl and fluff with fork. Cool completely. Stir in nuts, green onions and basil. Makes about 7 cups.

Greek-style chicken fig salad

- ❑ 1/4 cup orange juice
- ❑ 1 tbsp. plain tofu yogurt
- ❑ 1 tbsp. lemon juice
- ❑ 1 garlic clove, crushed with a garlic press
- ❑ 1/2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
- ❑ pepper, to taste
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups cooked, diced chicken breast
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups canned chickpeas, rinsed ❑ and drained
- ❑ 1/2 cucumber, peeled and sliced 1/4-in.thick
- ❑ 1/2 small red onion, finely chopped
- ❑ 3/4 cup (about 10) fresh figs, diced
- ❑ 3 cups mixed salad greens
- ❑ 6 tbsp. chopped fresh mint

In a large bowl, whisk together the orange juice, yogurt, lemon juice, garlic, mustard and pepper. Whisk in the olive oil until well blended. Add the chicken, chickpeas, cucumber, onion and figs; stir and toss to coat well (see note). Store in refrigerator until ready to serve.

To serve, divide the salad greens among 6 individual plates. Top each with an equal amount of the chicken mixture. Sprinkle with the mint.

Note: The recipe makes enough dressing to lightly coat the salad ingredients. If you prefer a heavier coating, you may double the dressing amounts. Makes 6 servings (8 cups).

Fig raisin spice loaf

Fresh figs and raisins shine in this delicious spice loaf made in a loaf pan. You can also bake it in an 8- or 9-in. square pan or as muffins. Reduce the baking time accordingly. This goes together fast and is great source of fibre. Try it toasted for breakfast. The glaze is optional.

- ❑ 1 cup chopped fresh figs (may substitute 1/2 cup chopped dried figs)
- ❑ 1 cup raisins
- ❑ 1-3/4 cups all-purpose flour
- ❑ 2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 2 tsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. fresh-grated nutmeg
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. allspice
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 cup solid shortening (may substitute an equal amount of butter or margarine)
- ❑ 1 cup brown sugar, packed
- ❑ 2 eggs, beaten
- ❑ 1/2 cup sour cream
- ❑ 1/2 cup milk

Optional Glaze:
- ❑ 1 cup powdered confectioners' sugar

heavy cream or milk

Preheat oven to 375. Grease a standard loaf pan. Cover figs and raisins with boiling water and let sit to plump for 15 minutes. Drain thoroughly and pat dry with paper towels. In a medium bowl, whisk together flour, baking powder, cinnamon, nutmeg, allspice, and salt. Set aside.

In a large bowl, cream shortening and brown sugar together until it resembles clumpy wet sand. Beat in eggs, sour cream and milk. Add flour mixture, half at a time, to the wet ingredients. Blend until smooth and combined. Batter will be thick. Fold in figs and raisins by hand. Pour into prepared pan and bake about 1 hour, or until a toothpick inserted in the center comes out clean. Let cool to room temperature before slicing to serve.

Optional Glaze: Add heavy cream or milk to powdered sugar a little at a time, just until it reaches a spreadable consistency. Spread or drizzle on top of cooled loaf. ■

Gary Kenzer: bias battle can be won on social media

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Gary Kenzer is the national executive director of Honest Reporting USA, a Chicago-based group that monitors Israel's coverage in the international media and works to highlight and challenge what the organization deems biased or unfair coverage.

Kenzer was in Toronto Oct. 14 to speak at Adath Israel Congregation about issues pertaining to Israel's portrayal in the media.

Was the speaking event at Adath Israel planned because of the recent spike in violence between Israelis and Palestinians?

No, the event was planned back in May or so. But Israel's coverage in the media can be a relevant topic pretty much at any time. This media war that's going on now – and it is a war, one declared on the battlefront of the media – I'm not sure that we who stand with Israel are doing well. I think that groups like us and StandWithUs [a non-profit, pro-Israel education and advocacy organization] are doing great stuff, and our website has been exploding with people visiting it. But what's missing is the pro-Israel masses really participating in the way communication gets out today, which is through social media. We need to jump more on the bandwagon and get the message out.

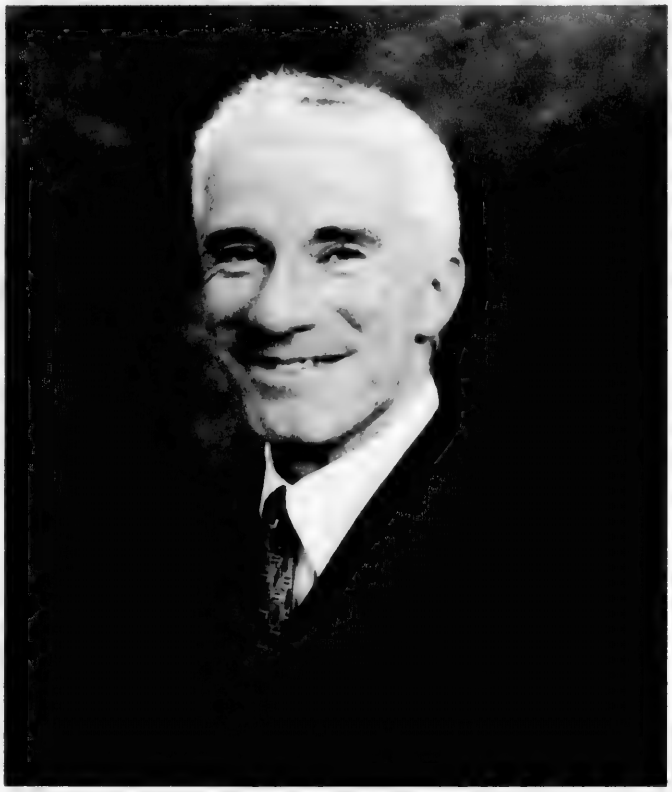
What would you like to see people in this camp doing?

One of the things I talked about at the event was the importance of getting more people on board with positively portraying Israel in social media. I'm amazed at how many people don't understand how easy it is to get the message out to the masses that way. We can't assume the power of social media is lost in this war.

Honest Reporting also has this campaign going now called Israeli Lives Matter, which is a take on Black Lives Matter. We're demanding that the BBC report accurately when Palestinian terrorists murder Israelis. We're trying to get 20,000 or more signatures. People can post about that on social media.

Also, we want people to talk about the issue. Don't keep it a secret. People are feeling overwhelmed by the negative information that's out there about Israel and feel it's not something we can overcome. But if that's the perception, then we're going to lose this battle.

It's dark days right now – there's been a lot of bloodshed. But as our organization's CEO said, we're not going to apologize for the lack of loss of life on the Israeli side.



Gary Kenzer is national executive director of Honest Reporting USA

> We want people to talk about the issue. Don't keep it a secret.

Why should we apologize for the fact there's more dead on one side than the other?

Do you believe that the mainstream media in North America are anti-Israel?

Stuff we post on our website comes from all over the world, so if there's bias out there anywhere, it can go viral and become our problem.

The anti-Israel media bias might not be as bad in the United States or Canada, but that doesn't mean it won't be just as bad for, say, the Jewish community in Toronto if there are negative messages about Israel coming from media in South Africa.

But are Canadian and American newspapers generally anti-Israel, in your view?

Yes. I won't say the press is as godawfully bad as it was 10 years ago, but I think a lot of the media have been nudged along by the politics of the country.

There are people who argue that the North American media are actually quite pro-Israel, while the Israeli media are more nuanced in showing both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. How do you respond to that?

I'm concerned about people in North America reading the news about Israel from Israeli news sources online, because it tends to be very political. You'll read the same story written very differently in a paper to the left from a paper to the right. And if you don't understand the political nuance of Israeli life, you're not going to understand what you're reading.

Does Honest Reporting monitor news sources from the Arab world?

Right now we monitor a little over 1,500 newspapers every day. We have people working as translators from our media facility in Jerusalem.

What sorts of things are you seeing in the Arab press regarding the recent surge of violence in Israel and the Palestinian territories?

We're finding that the violence going on right now is being endorsed.

Unfortunately, you don't find a whole lot of news sources out there in the Arab world condemning this violence against Israeli Jews or saying it's wrong. We're finding just the opposite. It's very vile.

My concern is that more than ever people are taking stuff about Israel at face value, and you can't do that, because then we're going to lose the battle.

This is no small battle, especially because no one on the Palestinian side seems to be taking responsibility for the violence – not Hamas, not Hezbollah, not the Palestinian Authority. I think there's a lot of this lone wolf stuff and that's what's doing damage and seems to be driving this momentum.

I think all of this anti-Israel messaging in the media is not overwhelming if we take it one piece at a time and take the other side of story and share it. That's why organizations like ours are so important, because we dig for the other side of the story. Then at least, if people can make their mind up based on complete information.

Do you see a risk in news stories having too much of a pro-Israel slant?

If it slides to the other side because people are getting both sides of the story, so be it. If that happens, at least people will be making decisions based upon a complete set of information.

All we want is for the truth to set the record straight. We want people to realize that Israel's not a perfect country and that it should be treated the same as any country in the world expects to be treated, which is innocent until proven guilty, and not the other way around. ■

The gambling rabbi

Backstory

RABBI YIRMIYA MILEVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In our era of media sensationalism very few things get more coverage than scandalous conduct by men of the cloth. Unfortunately, over the past few years individuals with the title "Rabbi" have made their way into the headlines for a whole list of vices. Although the recent accounts are quite unseemly for a member of the clergy, rabbinic moral weaknesses is unfortunately nothing new.

Among the more fascinating Jewish personalities to emerge from the Renaissance was a rabbi by the name of Leon De Modena of Venice (1571–1648). At the age of 13, he was recognized as a prodigy, after penning a poem entitled Kina Sh'mor that made sense whether it was read in Italian or in Hebrew.

Despite his great talents, Rabbi Modena struggled to find a steady source of income. Over the years, he found employment as a Hebrew and rabbinics teacher, a proofreader and author of Hebrew tombstone epitaphs. In one of his works, he listed 26 occupations to which he resorted from time to time. Today, he is known among scholars of the Kabbalah for a work titled Ari Nohem, in which he asserted that the "Bible of the Kabbalists," the Zohar, a text attributed to the second-century Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai, was actually the work of a 13th-century Spanish rabbi and Kabbalist named Moses de León.

Despite all of his talent, scholarship and knowledge, Rabbi Modena had a weakness: he had an addiction to games of chance. It seems that his first taste of the game came on Chanukah, when many spend their leisure time wagering on the four-sided spinning top known as the dreidl, and on cards. Rabbi Modena himself reported that "During Chanukah [1598] Satan duped me into playing games of chance, and by the following Shavuot [May 30-31, 1599], I lost more than 300 ducats."

Although his weakness was well known, he was respected by the majority of the community. Some scholars, however, were unhappy with him for his views and behaviour. A specific rabbi attempted to ridicule Rabbi Modena's scholarship by stating that "Modena has made more money in gambling than by selling his works." Rabbi Modena responded to the charge by noting that "unfortunately the truth is I have lost a lot in the gambling while my books have brought in a profit."

> Despite all of his talent, scholarship and knowledge, Rabbi Modena had a weakness: he had an addiction to games of chance

Years ago, I would participate at times in a service called the "Yom Kippur Katan" – the "Minor Yom Kippur." This service, which is performed the day before Rosh Chodesh, the "New Moon," includes penitential poems and prayers, and by some is treated as day of fasting, repentance and supplication with resemblance to the day of Yom Kippur. The custom originated among the Safed Kabbalists in the 16th century.

In one of the poems, we confess to the fact that on a daily basis we are guilty of "Leaving the school and following the money." The most basic understanding of the statement relates to the fact that humans are more interested in physical pleasures attained through money, than in learning and growing spiritually achieved in a school.

However, after noticing that the author of this well-known poem is none other than Rabbi Leon De Modena, I wonder if perhaps the "following the money" that is being confessed is something far more complex. ■

Bibi calls Justin, and a comedian promotes Holocaust education

Expect change in tone, Trudeau says

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Justin Trudeau Oct. 23 to congratulate him on his election win. Israeli Ambassador to Canada Rafael Barak said Israel was assured that relations will stay strong even after the defeat of Stephen Harper's pro-Israel Tories, Canadian Press reported. "Mr. Trudeau has been very consistent from the very beginning of his campaign in expressing his support for Israel," Barak said. "I'm sure maybe the style will change. But I don't feel there will be a change on the substance. I'm really reassured." A Liberal spokesperson said the call was "very positive" and that Trudeau "explained there would be a shift in tone, but Canada would continue to be a friend of Israel's."

Nathan Fielder's Shoah jacket

Canadian Jewish comedian Nathan Fielder went on the talk show Conan Oct. 22 to discuss his new outdoor clothing line that promotes Holocaust education. Wearing a Summit Ice windbreaker, Fielder explained that he developed the line after learning Vancouver-based Taiga, the jacket brand he used to wear, once published a tribute to late B.C. Holocaust denier Doug Collins in its catalogue. "The jacket's water-resistant, it's got a two-way stretch, it's very breathable, and [it lets] you know that six million Jews did die," he told host Conan O'Brien. "We're all about the quality and getting those facts out." All profits go to the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre.

Roger Waters sells out

A theatre in Sag Harbor, N.Y., offered refunds to a sold-out show by Roger Waters, who supports a boycott of Israel, but said it got no takers. Waters, former frontman of rock band Pink Floyd, has vocally criticized artists who perform in Israel. He was scheduled to play Oct. 30 at the Bay Street Theater and was expected to face picketers in a protest organized by pro-Israel groups. The Simon Wiesenthal Center also urged New Yorkers to boycott the gig, but the theatre's executive director said no one asked for their money back and people were "begging for tickets." ■

How the UN could help

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has accused Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of incitement by falsely accusing Israel of upsetting a delicate status quo at a sensitive holy site revered by Jews and Muslims. Abbas says the violence is a natural result of decades of occupation and the lack of political solution.

United Nations secretary general Ban Ki-moon recently visited Israel and he could help solve the situation by visiting the Temple Mount and observing for himself that there has been no change in the status quo. If the secretary general is truly honest and objective, he would stand before the United Nations and indicate that the Palestinians are wrong and that Israel is upholding the agreement with respect to the Temple Mount that was made after the 1967 war.

I am afraid it would take a bigger man than the secretary general to make an honest proclamation, even though it would likely end the violence.

Renewed memorial a 'shandeh'

I have visited the Earl Bales Shoah memorial many times ("Refurbished memorial draws 600 to Shoah event," Oct. 15). This profoundly moving place has always deeply affected me. I've always taken foreign visitors to the site. Without exception, my guests have been visibly moved and have fallen silent when they beheld the message, the chimney, the markers, and, sadly, the many names.

I shall never visit or show visitors this new travesty. From a successful, almost holy place, to remember, we now have a crass, tasteless, loud shandeh. The monuments are now worthy to compete with the advertising billboards on Bathurst Street.

The names of the martyrs are diminished. The donors are the focus. In starkly contrasting colour, script and huge in size, the donors have become the heroes. From what was once the reverent approach from the driveway, one now passes between heavy obelisks shouting, "Look at me! I gave!"

I thank and respect the donors. The donors should be recognized, but they should not be centre stage. They should not overwhelm the real purpose of this memorial.

Place the names of the donors a little distance off. Do not have the donors' names belittle our martyrs. Let's re-donate and rework this embarrassment.

Let us recall Maimonides' eight levels of charity.

Post-election reflections

Benjamin Shinewald wrote a very good piece ("After the election, a new day for the Jewish community," Oct. 29).

I, for one, am sick of being told by Jewish Conservatives that I have to vote Conservative in order to show gratitude to outgoing prime minister Stephen Harper, regardless of my views on the economy, social policy, the environment, etc. It is good to see that Prime Minister-elect Justin Trudeau and NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair neutralized this issue and made it clear that none of the major parties are anti-Israel.

The attempt to make Israel a wedge issue failed, as it looks like Canadian Jews trended away from the Tories in the recent election.

Asking the right question

Paul Socken's article, "The gift of a good question" (Oct. 8), and his assertion that "Jews in particular are a curious lot, obsessed with questions, whether or not there is an answer" brought to mind an anecdote about the late Nobel Laureate physicist, Isidor Rabi. When he was asked why he became a scientist, he said, "My mother made me a scientist without ever intending it. Every other Jewish mother in Brooklyn would ask her child after school 'So? Did you learn anything today?' But not my mother. She always asked me a different question. 'Izzy,' she would say, 'did you ask a good question today?'"

Years ago, I mentioned Rabi's comment to a colleague of mine, Barry Hennick, at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Later that day, he put up a sign on his classroom door which read: "Did you ask a good question today?"

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

Gendered mitzvot and separate roles

Is there a place for spaces and rituals that are only meant for men or women, or is there is a way to balance traditional modes and contemporary sensitivities?

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: In the past couple of years, I have noticed a marked increase in events billed as "challah bakes." These functions are geared to women in the community as a way to do a mitzvah that is "theirs," and often include a component of prayer for those who are ill or in need of assistance in the community.

Every time I come across a flyer for an event like this, I want to applaud it. But I also begin to ponder the nature of gendered mitzvot and whether the mitzvah of separating challah is actually the best vehicle for discussing separate roles for those of different genders in the community.

As a Conservative rabbi, how do you view gender and its role in ritual? Clearly you feel like the prayer space is fully equal, but is there a place in our faith for spaces and rituals that are only meant for men or women?

After all, if a man bakes bread, he is also obligated to separate challah.

Rabbi Scheim: The very day that I write this response, my synagogue is hosting a challah bake, with mostly, but not entirely, female participation.

In an earlier age, this would have suggested boundaries to the "woman's place" in Jewish life. Certainly, in my congregation, this is not the case, since women can participate in ritual equal to men, with the exception of the kohen and levi Torah honours and Birkat Kohanim (the priestly blessing) on festivals, which we limit to men.

Upholding the distinction between the sexes when it comes to kohen/levi, and maintaining the tradition that such lineage is patrilineal while Jewishness is matrilineal, is not without controversy. There is room, I believe, for some degree of sex-specific roles in ritual, reflecting the challenging balance between classical/traditional modes and legitimate contemporary sensitivities.

Rabbi Finegold: Your examples seem to highlight what I think the underlying issue is here. In the 21st century, there are men who bake and would love to participate in challah bakes, thus undermining the stereotype that women belong in the kitchen and should, therefore, be the ones that make the bread in the family.

This is a major upheaval that leaves many people who want to cling to tradition feeling uncomfortable. On the other hand, the priesthood does not play a major role in most peoples' lives and is an easier place to create sex-specific roles.

The dynamic at play here is that there is much more, even in traditional or Orthodox Judaism. By focusing on the differences that are specific to men or to women, we potentially create an unhealthy space for gender discussion. For example, in Orthodoxy, if we dwell on the commandments that are specific to women, rather than on the fact that the vast majority of mitzvot are open to both sexes, we are sending the message that women belong in the home and the mikveh, rather than in the beit midrash.

In essence, the contemporary sensitivity that you speak of seems to be more about redefining the existing Torah, something which I think we both can agree on.

Rabbi Scheim: Some patterns are definitely difficult to break. The Conservative movement has tried hard to encourage women to put on tfillin, suggesting that tfillin need not be exclusive to men. This endeavour has clearly not met with success, for very few women outside of the rabbinate have chosen to do so.

It may be that existing rituals, such as candlelighting and tfillin, have become so identified with one sex that they become very hard to introduce to the opposite sex, no matter whatever halachic justification one may find. You are right in suggesting that most mitzvot – especially those not time-bound such as prayer, study, Sabbath and festival observance – apply equally to men and women. That "common ground" aspect of Judaism certainly deserves greater emphasis.

Having just left Ben-Gurion Airport earlier today, walking by the booth where men are encouraged to put on tfillin, it occurs to me that outreach for men and women together to engage in practise of Jewish ritual would be a welcome addition to the public Jewish sphere. With a combination of creativity and audacity, perhaps such an opportunity could be created. ■

The media's role in helping agunot

The Dayton Jewish Observer was the first to report last week about the plight of Adina Porat. In 1990, she married a man named Dovid Porat in Israel, and the couple would go on to have five children. But in 2007, Porat left his family and moved to the United States, where he assumed the name Eli Shur. As he set about trying to build a new identity, Adina Porat was also trying to start anew. But she couldn't, because Shur refused to grant her a get (Jewish divorce).

For years, the Organization for the Resolution of Agunot (ORA) has tried to secure a get for Adina Porat, but to no avail. Now, ORA is appealing to the viral power of the Internet and the collective authority of community. Last week, the website www.freeadina.com went online, containing information about the case and pictures of both parties, and promoting a Nov. 8 protest near Shur's home.

It remains to be seen whether these latest efforts will prove successful, but they appear to indicate the emergence of a new form of public campaigning on behalf of agunot, women who are "chained" to their marriages. The Porat-Shur case is the second in two years to play out in the press, after the New York Post broke the story of Gital Dodelson, a Lakewood, N.J., woman whose husband, Avrohom Meir Weiss, also refused to give her a get. Three months after Dodelson's story went viral, Weiss relented.

Adina Porat and the ORA clearly took notice of the satisfying ending to Dodelson's ordeal. And they're not the only ones: a few weeks back, I was introduced to a young woman whose Israeli husband refuses to grant her a get. When I asked her how I could help, she requested that I help her place a story about her husband in some of the major Israeli newspapers. She hoped the media might be able to shame her husband into freeing her.

Around the Jewish world, there are countless organizations and individuals working tirelessly to help agunot, and there have been a number of successes in recent years. If the media and the Internet can be harnessed to further this agenda, that can only add another powerful weapon in this essential battle.

In this week's CJN, Bill Gladstone reports on the bizarre story of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library of Toronto (see page 40). Eight years ago, the library was closed "due to a lack of resources and a decline in circulation of books being taken out," according to spokesperson Dara Solomon. Ever since, the library's more than 30,000-plus volumes have been confined to a storage facility.

"No one is interested in taking on older books," Solomon explains to Gladstone. "I haven't been able to find any interest in them."

I distinctly remember visiting the library as a young student doing research for school projects. It's hard to imagine that there's no better use for this collection than gathering dust in a dark locker. Isn't there anyone out there who can give a good home to these Jewish books? If you have any ideas, please let us know. ■ — YONI

ANALYSIS

India strengthens Israel's Asia strategy

Ng Weng Hoong

The groundbreaking first visit to Israel by an Indian president Oct. 13 to 15 hardly featured in the global media, which were more focused on a potential third intifadah uprising, the growing U.S.-Russia proxy war in Syria, and the Iranian parliament's approval of Tehran's nuclear deal with six global powers.

Nevertheless, President Pranab Mukherjee's historic entry into Jerusalem from the Palestinian territories and his stirring speeches to underline New Delhi's pro-Israel shift could have a more lasting impact on the Middle East as it adds India, together with China, to Israel's increasing security, political and economic pivot toward Asia.

Mukherjee's opening speech powerfully and unequivocally laid out India's support for Israel as he condemned "the growing menace of terrorism and extremism" amid the outbreak of Palestinian stabbings of Israelis.

In the Knesset, he spoke of the two countries as "fellow democracies," while remembering "with gratitude" that Israel had supported India's claim to a permanent seat on the UN Security Council and provided defence supplies to his country during a 1999 war with Pakistan. He said "persecuted Jews" who first sought refuge in his country more than 2,000 years ago "will always be an integral part of India's composite society."

Already Israel's largest defence market, India will look to increase bilateral co-operation in security matters, technology and agriculture, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said following a meeting with Mukherjee.

India's pro-Israel shift has been pronounced since the May 2014 election of Prime Minister Narendra Modi as he shares the Jewish nation's fear of radical Islam and a strong personal bond with Netanyahu, said Efraim Inbar, the director of the Tel Aviv-based Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies (BESA).

Modi's Hindu-based BJP-led government has abstained in three major UN votes against Israel, reversing India's past automatic support for the Arab world. To be sure, Mukherjee affirmed India's traditional support for "a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine, with east Jerusalem as its capital" during his visit to the Palestinian territories. On Oct. 21, India also joined 25 countries in a UN motion to condemn "Israel's aggression" on the Temple Mount.

Nevertheless, "there is a growing common strategic agenda between India and Israel," said Inbar, who notes the Indian establishment has grown tired of backing Arab causes. He said that despite decades of loyally voting with the Arab nations against Israel, India has found itself at the receiving end of the Islamic world's continued support for Pakistan.

Modi's India has become less fearful of offending the Arab world, which is in political and economic meltdown because of worsening internal conflicts, the rise of the Islamic State (ISIS) and the collapse of oil and gas prices, Inbar said.

India is also encouraged by Sunni-led Saudi Arabia courting Israel to counter Iran's Shia regime, which is emerging from isolation as it edges toward a nuclear deal with the P5+1 group.

Like China, an increasingly confident India is also deeply engaged with Iran, and this, ironically, could serve to bolster Israel's security interest.

"Iran listens to India and China. The Iranians have a completely different relationship with India and China than they have with the West," said Asia watcher Shalom Salomon Wald at the Jerusalem-based Jewish People Policy Institute (JPPI).

Apart from their shared long history of cultural interactions and trade ties, "the Iranians can't blame the Indians or the Chinese for anything that has gone wrong with their country," Wald said in a phone interview.

But unlike Israel, India welcomes Iran's nuclear deal with the P5+1 group, as it opens up the possibility of expanded trade and strategic ties between the two countries. Apart from a long-term role in developing one of the world's largest oil and gas reserves, India is also staking out a position in Iran's Chabahar deep-sea port facing the Indian Ocean, which has suffered from a lack of investment after years of trade and economic sanctions. The two countries recently signed an agreement to develop the port and support infrastructure to help India's push to expand trade into Central Asia as well as compete against China.

Despite his belief in the growing positive influence of India and China in the Middle East, Wald is surprisingly pessimistic that the two Asian powers will deter Iran from its alleged plans to attack Israel.

"For the Islamic religious fanatics, the elimination of Israel is their raison d'être. It's a very old tradition in Shia Islam to hate and persecute Jews," Wald said. Inbar, who also opposes the Iran nuclear deal, shares Wald's fears.

But India appears not to subscribe to the bleak assessment that Iran is planning to attack Israel, at least not for now. In separate interviews, two Indian scholars said Iran has more pressing issues to worry about, especially its worsening conflicts with Saudi Arabia.

"Iran has a lot of 'catching up' to do, having lost momentum owing to sanctions. Why would it undo the gains from the deal and the opportunity to recover by attacking Israel and inviting the return of sanctions?" said Rajesh Manohar Basrur, professor of international relations at the S Rajaratnam School of International Studies in Singapore's Nanyang Technological University.

With its growing stake in the Middle East, India has much to lose if Iran and Israel go to war against each other, said Meena Singh Roy, a research fellow at the New Delhi-based Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses.

"The Iranians are a pragmatic people. At the same time, India and other Asian countries today have a lot at stake in both Iran and Israel keeping the peace," Roy said. While still dependent on the Middle East for their energy supplies, Asian countries are also increasingly vested in the region's geopolitical stability amid the spread of radical Islam and ISIS, she said.

As with Mukherjee's under-reported visit to Israel, Asia's understated influence could be an unlikely new source of hope to limit conflicts in the Middle East. ■

Korean Catholic co-chairs Holocaust Education Week

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

This year's Holocaust Education Week (HEW), from Nov. 2 to 9, offers a lot of diversity.

Among the 160 or so programs, panels and lectures is one that will examine the Holocaust's rallying cry of "never again" from a Christian perspective, featuring Catholic theologian Gregory Baum; one that will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Armenian genocide; one that will look at the persecution of homosexuals by the Nazi regime and its meaning for gay survivors; and HEW's first-ever discussion of anti-Semitism in the Muslim world, featuring a Muslim speaker.

There are also more new venues than in years past, including Catholic and secular public schools.

In keeping with that spirit of outreach is this year's HEW co-chair, Lily Kim.

"I'm not the typical face of Holocaust education or the Jewish community," readily accedes Kim, a Christian of Korean parentage.

Her presence on the scene "makes people stop and listen," she said.

> I love everything about Israel, the culture, the country, the people.

A 42-year-old educator and mother of two boys, Kim first got involved in HEW in 2008 as a Christian liaison. She had seen a decrease in the involvement of Christian churches and schools in the program and set out to correct that.

HEW now has an interfaith outreach committee, which has worked to stage what Kim calls "non-traditional" programs at more venues. This year's theme explores "Liberation: Aftermath & Rebirth" and will look at the raw years after the Holocaust.

Born outside Vancouver to Buddhist parents who left South Korea in the early 1970s and converted to Christianity, Kim studied history at the University of British Columbia. For a brief time, she taught English to doctors and nurses at a hospital outside Seoul and considered doing an international business degree.

Lily Kim

Instead, she enrolled in McMaster University's divinity school and earned a master's degree in theological studies.

"I was always very interested in the Hebrew Bible," Kim told The CJN in an interview. "I found many similarities between Christianity and Judaism. Most appealing to me was the concept of mercy and love, not only for those inside the religions but for those outside — the other."

Still, she found Christian texts "too limiting" and "was more interested in Jewish culture."

Around a decade ago, she made her first trip to Israel – there would be four more through the years – and fell in love.

"I love everything about Israel," Kim said, "the culture, the country, the people. It's messy, but so is Korea."

Each time, Kim visited Yad Vashem, Israel's central Holocaust authority and museum.

Azrieli Holocaust memoirs celebrate 10th anniversary

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A decade ago, when Naomi Azrieli and her late father David first put out a call for unpublished memoirs by Holocaust survivors in Canada with the intention of preserving and sharing them, they were not sure what the response would be.

They soon realized the Azrieli Foundation would be fulfilling an unmet need: the desire of so many to tell what happened to them during the war and afterward – before it was too late.

"We received manuscripts in English, French, Yiddish, Polish, Russian and Hungarian," Naomi said at an Oct. 26 celebration of the Holocaust memoirs publishing program's 10th anniversary.

"Some were typed, some were handwritten. They were full length, and even poetry," she said.

Over its history, the program has received more than 180 manuscripts, and numberless other types of Holocaust-related submissions. To date, 62 titles by 42 authors have been published (some are available in English and French).

The selected manuscripts are turned into highly readable stories and published as high-quality paperbacks, containing photos and illustrations, by a team of editors, translators and artists.

In recent years, videos have been added. Interviews with the authors are enhanced with animation and dramatic narration in these short films.

The books and videos are given festive launches with author tributes and signings.

Education is the program's main goal and the books are made available free of charge to anyone, with high schools, colleges and libraries the target audience.

In recent years, the Toronto-based program has been increasing its outreach in Quebec. This year alone, 20,000 books were distributed in the province, said Azrieli, the foundation's chair and CEO. Across the country, close to 65,000 books have been sent out – so far.

Eleven new editions were unveiled at the celebration, including Alone in the Storm (Seul dans la tourmente) by Leslie Vertes and Where Courage Lives (Les Lieux du courage: Ils m'appelaient Marie) by Muguette Myers, both of Montreal, who spoke on behalf of their fellow authors.

Intermarrying rabbis: punchlines or prophets?

David Weinfeld

Jackie Mason famously joked, "My synagogue is so Reform, the rabbi is a gentile." Now, with the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (RRC) recently deciding to admit students whose partners are non-Jews, and to ordain current students with non-Jewish partners, Mason's joke is approaching reality. And the "ever-dying people" must ask their timeless question: is this good for the Jews?

North American Jews have faced this sort of situation before. In 1873, Rabbi Felix Adler, son of and heir apparent to Reform Rabbi Samuel Adler, gave an address at Temple Emanu-El in New York. Called "Judaism of the Future," it omitted any mention of God, instead arguing that Jews should lead the way toward a universal religion founded on moral principles.

Facing a mix of protest and support, Rabbi Felix Adler founded the Society for Ethical Culture in 1877 – a clear move away from Jewish particularism, as his new society welcomed gentiles by removing all Judaic liturgy and rituals.

Some years later, Reform Rabbi Charles Fleischer began to take his Boston congregation, Adath Israel, in a similar direction. In 1900, he attempted to move the traditional Saturday morning services to Sunday. In 1911, after many fights with the synagogue's board of trustees, he resigned from Adath Israel and founded the Sunday Commons, an ecumenical, non-denominational congregation that combined Reform Judaism with liberal Protestantism to create a progressive and humanistic religion dedicated to fostering "enlightened citizenship." In 1919, he put the icing on his assimilationist wedding cake, marrying Mabel R. Leslie, a Presbyterian.

But unlike rabbis Adler and Fleischer, intermarried rabbis today are not using their professional roles as Jewish leaders to diminish Jewish particularism. They are not asking their congregants to accept the divinity of Jesus, Mohammed or Buddha. As long as they preach and profess Judaism from the pulpit, they are fulfilling their rabbinical duties.

The families of intermarried rabbis may encounter some difficulties raising their children, as all intermarried families do when faith is important to one or both parents. Even some who support the Reconstructionist college's decision may wonder why a Jew dedicated to the rabbinate would choose to date outside the faith, or why a non-Jew willing to marry a rabbi would not be willing to convert to Judaism. But these are questions for their therapists.

The Reconstructionist movement has always been on the cutting edge in addressing these questions. In 1935, the movement's founder, Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan, defined Judaism as an evolving religious civilization that needed to be reconstructed in every age and context. He famously suggested that Halachah, Jewish law, be given "a vote, but not a veto." That flexible motto allows for progressive adaptation that remains true to the spirit of Jewish tradition, and, by extension, Jewish particularism. Ordaining women, allowing same-sex marriage between Jews, and accepting Jews of patrilineal descent may have flouted Halachah, but these changes clearly enhanced the vitality, and the numeric strength, of the Jewish community.

Rabbi Kaplan was not strictly a theist, prompting some to joke that Reconstructionist Jews believe in "at most one God." Political scientist Charles Liebman once quipped that 70 per cent of American Jews are Reconstructionist "and they don't know it." Rabbi Kaplan's motto simply codified a reality: modern Jews prefer a pick-and-choose style Judaism to a legalistic one. Reconstructionism mimicked and legitimated behaviour that was already in place.

In that sense, the decision to allow intermarried rabbis is true to the Reconstructionist spirit, for intermarriage is a clearly established reality of Diaspora Jewish life. Thus, the Reconstructionist approach is let us use intermarriage, rather than bend to its will. Let intermarriage be a force for particularism, rather than universalism, by making more room in our unique community for those who want to embrace its uniqueness. ■

The educative power of a connected community

Daniel Held

I was in my second year of teaching when Jane Jacobs died. I knew Jacobs as the community organizer who ensured that Toronto's Allen Expressway didn't go south of Eglinton Avenue and New York's West Side Highway ended in the 40s. Stuck in traffic, I had often taken my frustration out on Jacobs. The CBC's retrospective on her, however, explained her philosophy and informed my thinking about Jewish community.

Cars, Jacobs argued, close off community. By stepping into a car and shutting the door, we close the door on our neighbours and isolate ourselves. A vocal advocate for public transit, Jacobs saw buses and trains as a way of building community.

At the time of her death, I was commuting from the school where I was teaching to the university where I was completing a master's degree. I decided I'd follow Jacob's advice and take the bus. The first day, I parked my car, got on the bus and sat down, ready to build community. I turned to my left and found a person plugged into an iPod; then turned to my right and found someone talking on his cellphone.

While this experiment in community building failed, it underscored the importance of setting and construct when it comes to community. Talking recently with a colleague about her own Jewish journey, I was struck by the reasons she offered for why she exposed herself to various experiences. She went to camp because her best friend was going. She went to a youth group because there was a cute guy there. And she goes to synagogue because of the programs for her kids. The social networks we weave both bring us to Jewish experiences and reinforce their impact on our lives.

In their book, Connected: The Surprising Power of Our Social Networks and How they Shape our Lives, Nicholas Christakis and James Fowler explain that "the social influence does not end with the people we know. If we affect our friends, and they affect their friends, then our actions can potentially affect people we have never met." Christakis and Fowler chart the impact that social networks have on nearly every aspect of our lives – from smoking and weight to economics and politics.

People who work in settings of immersive Jewish learning have known this for decades. The power of day schools, camps and Israel trips is not only in the taught curriculum, but is fuelled by the sociology of the group experience – setting norms for communal living and shared expectations of peers. The educators who create these experiences pour hours of diligent thought into how to construct the setting, activities and unstructured time to maximize these community experiences. The peer-to-peer reinforcement of values is critical to their success in forging strong Jewish identities.

Jacob's philosophy, however, taught me that the power of the connected social network goes beyond the curated environments of schools, shuls and camps. Jewish neighbourhoods are important crucibles for the development of Jewish life and identity. Thousands of families make a conscious decision to live in Jewish neighbourhoods, even thought other areas of town may be less expensive. In Toronto, Thornhill Woods' growing population of young families is a prime example. In deciding to live there, families are implicitly saying that they want their children to grow up in a particular social, cultural and religious milieu. While we don't have tools to measure it, Jacobs, Christakis and Fowler would agree that the nature of connected communities powerfully reinforces the values we want our families to have.

In a gastronomical culture like ours, it's easy to say that you are Jewishly what you eat. In truth, you are who you're connected to, and the challenge to us as a community is to think about how we build and maintain those connections. ■

Echoes of the past in some of our rituals

Jean M. Gerber

The days of Sukkot for me are among the highlights of the year. All the Days of Awe are, well, awesome, but Sukkot is aptly named a time for rejoicing. The harvest is in, looks like rain, the temple service is filled with prayers for the coming year.

Oh, wait, we don't bring in a harvest in Vancouver or Toronto. Two thousand years after that Temple went up in flames, we live by and large in cities. Vancouver could certainly use rain (don't laugh), but the downpours we pray for are supposed to fall in the land of Israel.

So what is special about Sukkot? It is benching lulav (praying with the lulav and the etrog).

Which brings me to the main thrust of this article. Magic. Magic and superstitions, bad luck or a good mazal, that lucky star.

Perhaps the ceremonies of Sukkot are not magic, but they are magical.

Having been at the Kotel (Western Wall) during Sukkot, I remember clearly a sea of tallitot and the high wands of the lulavim as hundreds blessed the season. The end of Sukkot found hundreds more celebrating drawing of the water. It was then that I realized the utter pagan foundation of this beloved ceremony, this sympathetic magic.

Perhaps pagan is a strong word: we assume that our ceremonial practices are, and ever were, monotheistic. Yet, the origins of this festival seem rooted (no pun intended) in harvest times, when Israelite farmers dependent on abundant rain and plentiful harvests to sustain life sought ways to make heaven hear their pleas.

Judaism believes that prayer and repentance at this time of year will reach the One whom we trust, just as 2,000 years ago, the people of Israel believed their Temple rituals would bring the needed rain.

A reading of books such as Jewish Magic and Superstition by Joshua Trachtenberg reveals a myriad of practices that Jews have observed, reflecting a very un-Jewish back story.

Take the magic circle drawn by the bride when she circles her husband seven times. Clearly meant to protect this fragile male from the evil designs of creatures like Lilith who try to steal the groom. Ditto breaking the wedding glass, the sound of which scares away demons.

> I realized the utter pagan foundation of this beloved ceremony, this sympathetic magic

Or changing the sick male child's name to Alter to fool the angel of death.

Or not blowing the shofar on Erev Rosh Hashanah, to hide the fact that we are about to open ourselves to a new year.

Now, I am not suggesting that we pin amulets on our children, or draw a circle of salt around the baby's crib, or tie red thread around a boy's crib to protect against Lilith's demon children, or refrain from the ceremony of cutting a boy's hair at age three (to fool the angel of death into thinking he is a girl.)

But I do say that we should recognize in many of the practices we still observe (including covering the mirrors in a house of mourning) echoes from a far past when Judaism rubbed up against very un-Jewish beliefs that slowly made their way into mainstream Judaism.

I love the austerity of rabbinic Judaism. Rather than having the burden of the Law, of which we have often been accused, the joy of observance fills our lives with meaning.

But sometimes, just once in a while – and especially at Sukkot – I revel in the connection I can make with those Israelite farmers thousands of years ago who wanted to use every possible symbol in their thirst for water.

No charmers, wizards (OK, maybe Harry Potter) or mediums for me.

But now and then, do we not all find ourselves trying mightily to bring an influence into our lives from when our ancestors looked wherever they could to find just the right answer to their prayers? ■

Abbas' toxic rhetoric unreported as Israel blamed for violence

Paul Michaels

Rioting and random, gruesome stabbing attacks by Palestinians have left Israelis in a fearful state. The need to convey accurately and fairly to western audiences what's at issue has never been more essential.

Unfortunately, much of the media's reporting on the attacks has been woefully incomplete, devoid of context or jaded. As is typical when Israelis must protect themselves against terror attacks, there are references to a disparity in the "body count" – more Palestinians killed than Israelis, and charges of Israeli "overreaction" and "disproportionate" use of force fly with abandon.

In an Oct. 15 Globe and Mail article, Patrick Martin relied substantially on Diana Buttu, a Canadian-born lawyer and former adviser to PA President Mahmoud Abbas, for insight.

He quoted Buttu: "Amidst the violence and unrest, the Israeli army and police are operating on a 'shoot to kill' policy," leaving the impression that Israelis are wantonly brutal and callous. Indeed, when writing in late September about Abbas' threat to abandon the Oslo agreements, Martin cited Buttu, claiming that, in addition to settlers, "trigger-happy [Israeli] soldiers run rampant… terrorizing Palestinians with virtual impunity." On both occasions, Martin did not cite any Israeli authority or expert to provide Israel's side of the story.

In his mid-October report, Martin relied on Buttu about the core reason for the latest surge in the violence: "'The cause of Palestinian rage,' she insists, is the 'near-half-century of Israel's occupation of the West Bank, including Arab east Jerusalem.'"

Again, no Israeli is cited to refute this cookie-cutter "It's all about Israel's occupation" justification for violence. There's no mention that both former PA leader Yasser Arafat at Camp David in 2000 and Abbas during the Annapolis talks in 2008 rejected Israel's effort to create a Palestinian state and end the occupation. (Occasionally this column has drawn attention to these rarely mentioned historical facts in mainstream media stories, but they're critical to understanding the root of the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian and broader Arab-Israeli conflicts.)

Buttu is among those Palestinians who may speak to western audiences about the need for "two states," but who in fact reject "two states for two peoples" because they reject that the Jews are a people with sovereign rights to their ancestral homeland, and they insist that Palestinian refugees have an inherent "right of return" to Israel, which would turn Israel into another Arab-majority state.

In his Oct. 24 National Post column, Robert Fulford provided a powerfully succinct account of how Palestinian incitement, including through the PA media, against Israeli Jews has had a toxic impact – starting with Palestinian children urged to become "martyrs" by carrying out attacks against Israelis. Abbas himself is deeply involved. "At every chance he gets, Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's president, throws the word 'martyr' at the terrorist, while calling for calm in the international press," Fulford noted.

In Martin's story, the only mention of incitement is his claim, immediately following Buttu's insistence on the centrality of Israeli occupation, that "The rage of some young people is egged on" by Gaza-based "preachers" – not that their "rage" is instilled in them by Hamas, the PA, and now, through social media, ISIS.

As to the violence surrounding the Temple Mount, Abbas' slur that the Jews "have no right to desecrate [it] with their dirty feet" received scant mention in western media and none in Martin's reports. In his Oct. 21 story about the controversy of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's incorrect claim that, in 1941, Haj Amin Al-Husseini, then the grand mufti of Jerusalem, planted the idea of the Final Solution in Hitler's mind, and Netanyahu's later attempt to clarify what he meant, Martin finally referred to Netanyahu's charge against Abbas of anti-Israel incitement.

Nonetheless, in the context of dealing with a question of Netanyahu's credibility, this would, in all fairness, have been the time for Martin to cite at least one example of Abbas' toxic rhetoric to show the validity of the allegation against him.

Sadly, this was not the case. ■

U of Windsor protest targets Bedouin Israeli diplomat

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

A group of anti-Israel students hijacked a lecture by Israel's first Bedouin diplomat who had travelled to the University of Windsor to talk about his experience as a minority living in Israel because they "refused to allow a Zionist to lead the discussion on such a topic."

Law student Trevor Sher, who serves as the Jewish Student Association president at the University of Windsor, said Ishmael Khaldi, who has been working for the Israeli Foreign Ministry since 2004, was invited to campus to talk to students on Oct. 21 about his experience as a Bedouin in Israel and about minority rights.

"We thought it would be a good opportunity to provide a forum for intellectual discussion about what is a very complex issue, that is the Arab-Israeli conflict," Sher said.

"I thought he would be a perfect speaker, as someone who grew up as a minority in Israel can offer an insightful perspective about how minorities are treated and how things really are on the ground for them."

Sher said he was tipped off that there was going to be a walkout protest of Khaldi's talk, organized by a campus club called the Palestinian Solidarity Group.

"But we created this as a public event. The purpose of it was to bring in people who wanted to hear Khaldi's perspective. We didn't want to close off the event," he said.

He explained that the JSA, which includes members from all programs at the university, is a law school-ratified club, because most of the Jewish students at the university are in law school. The JSA decided to give priority seating to law students, but once they were all seated, they allowed undergraduate students and the demonstrators to sit in as well.

Sher said Khaldi was about 10 minutes into his presentation when the protest began.

"He didn't get into anything political. He started off by saying that protesting an event like his is a waste of time, saying, 'I'm not a politician, I'm just here to share my experience and my story.' He gave a few examples of the things he's trying to do to foster peace between Israelis and Palestinians," Sher said.

In a video uploaded to the Palestinian Solidarity Group's Facebook page, the protesters can be seen interrupting Khaldi by standing in their seats and taking turns shouting slogans at Khaldi before walking out as a group. One student can be heard saying, "Shame on you for supporting terrorism."

Sher said that once they walked out, those who remained were able to have a dialogue.

"One of the things Khaldi explained after the walkout was that people who take those kinds of actions are a barrier to peace. He made a really powerful statement... about there being only one pathway to peace, and that is through negotiation and dialogue," Sher said.

He said that following the walkout, the lecture continued, but Khaldi seemed more reserved and less willing to go into depth about Israeli politics and the conflict.

Ishmael Khaldi speaks to University of Windsor students after his talk.

> I think the protesters succeeded to some extent in preventing a dialogue.

"I think the protesters succeeded to some extent in preventing a dialogue. They made the environment such that it didn't feel like a real, open and honest dialogue was possible."

A CJN request for comment from the Palestinian Solidarity Group was declined, but a post on the group's Facebook page said, "we as pro-Palestinians refused to allow a Zionist to lead the discussion on such a topic... The pro-Palestinian voice is in charge of leading the discussions on Palestinian human rights on our campus, not Zionists.

"A constructive dialogue about Palestine cannot exist with anyone who denies the fundamental facts about the Palestinian occupation – that there is an illegal occupation... and that Israel by all measures is responsible for the vast majority of violence in Israel and Palestine."

Sher said the protesters followed up their demonstration with an appearance on a campus radio station show, The Shake Up, during which the protesters compared Zionists to neo-Nazis and members of the Ku Klux Klan.

"They said, the same way you wouldn't let a neo-Nazi or a member of the KKK talk about black rights, you shouldn't let a Zionist talk about Palestinian human rights," Sher said.

"Palestinians are suffering in Gaza and the West Bank, but to place the blame entirely on Israel is historically and factually incorrect."

Sher said the JSA will not make a formal complaint to the university about the protesters' conduct.

"While they may not respect our freedom of speech, we respect their freedom of speech. We respect that they are a group that considers themselves to be standing up for what they consider to be a just cause... It's not our place to deny the Palestinian narrative... I believe in taking the high road and not being brought down to a low level." ■

Book examines survivors' early experiences in Canada

jshupac@thecjn.ca

While there is no shortage of writing on Holocaust survivors in Canada, Adara Goldberg's Holocaust Survivors in Canada: Exclusion, Inclusion, Transformation, 1947-1955, published this fall by University of Manitoba Press, explores a specific period that Goldberg says scholarship on the subject has tended to skip over.

Holocaust Survivors is based on research that Goldberg, a native Torontonian and currently the education director at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, conducted for her PhD dissertation at Clark University's Strassler Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies.

It examines the first-hand immigration, resettlement and integration experiences of the roughly 35,000 survivors who came to Canada in the decade after World War II.

Though books like Irving Abella and Harold Troper's None Is Too Many famously address Canada's immigration policy toward Jewish refugees during and after the Holocaust, Goldberg's book is unique insofar as it highlights, in her words, "the ordinary and day-to-day struggles of survivor integration, not from a legal perspective, but from the perspectives of the individuals themselves."

Further, Goldberg said the time in question is often overlooked, because "people have been so obsessed with hearing gruesome wartime stories and then looking at the lives that were ultimately built [after the trauma], but the period in between can seem mundane."

She noted, however, that it's an important period that "tells us how human beings cope with trauma and rebuild. It also tells us a lot about Canadian society at that time."

Using archival materials such as case records from social service agencies and immigration files, as well as the oral histories of survivors and Jewish communal leaders from the period, Goldberg has created a window into the foundational experiences of Holocaust survivors in Canada, most of whom came from eastern Europe.

Having conducted some 125 interviews with survivors, their descendants, congregational leaders, scholars and former social service workers, she was able to illustrate the ways survivors navigated Canadian society and rebuilt their lives after immense trauma.

In their personal interviews with her, many survivors shared their reasons for choosing Canada as a site of new beginnings, the ways average Canadians responded to them upon their arrival and their efforts to build new lives despite, Goldberg said, "all odds being against them."

While it's known, she said, that the general Canadian public wasn't particularly well disposed to Jewish refugees at the time, she sought to look at how the survivors were treated by local Jewish communities when they first arrived. The book's focus ultimately became what Goldberg referred to as a "trifecta" of survivors, the Canadian Jewish community already in Canada, and the Jewish social service agencies that were charged with caring for the new Jewish arrivals.

Goldberg said her research revealed how much this unprecedented demand for refugee resettlement services was difficult for both the survivors and Jews who were already established in Canada.

While survivors' integration experiences and initial encounters with local Jewish communities were generally a "mixed bag," she said, most survivor accounts relate that the Canadian Jews' reception of them was fairly ambivalent or cold.

This wasn't because the Canadian Jews were "cruel or ill-intentioned" stressed Goldberg, whose own grandparents were all born in Canada, her great-grandparents having come from eastern Europe, but was reflective of the moment in history. "People didn't know about post-traumatic stress disorder then, and the Holocaust, as much as Canadian Jews knew about it, was probably impossible to comprehend," she said.

Goldberg emphasized that she makes no judgment about Jews who were already living in Canada. "These early interactions were so strained by language, culture, worldview, different experiences. It takes a long time for any group to overcome these things," she said.

Goldberg will be speaking about her book at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue on Nov. 5 at 7:30 p.m. ■

Opening of German archives provides new information

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Containing some 180 million pages of Holocaust-related documents, the vast archives of the International Tracing Service (ITS) of the Red Cross in Bad Arolsen, Germany, was subject to strict German privacy laws until 2007, when an 11-country international commission decided to open it up to public access.

Today copies of the ITS records, which include deportation lists and concentration camp, forced labour camp, some death camp and displaced persons camp information, are available in several repositories around the world, including Yad Vashem in Jerusalem and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM) in Washington, D.C.

To give Torontonians a better sense of this important collection, organizers of Holocaust Education Week arranged for the USHMM's Diane Afoumado to speak on Nov. 3 at Kehillat Shaarei Torah on "Restoring Family Trees Severed by the Holocaust," and to give private consultations to help people learn the specific fate of family members known to have perished.

Diane Afoumado

Afoumado, a Holocaust historian, told The CJN that ITS records are particularly rich in the postwar era but almost non-existent when it comes to death camps like Treblinka. Likewise, no lists were compiled of victims who were slaughtered on location, for example by the Nazi Einsatzgruppen death squads in Ukraine.

"Auschwitz was a camp with multiple functions, so we do have records from Auschwitz," she said. "We have records on everyone who entered the camp and was selected for forced labour. But if they were immediately sent to the gas chambers, their names do not appear in the Auschwitz collection. If they were registered beforehand on a deportation list, that would be the last trace we have of them."

> We have a lot of requests from survivors who are seeking compensation for having been in hiding or in ghettos or in camps.

Documents in the ITS were written in 27 languages and a variety of scripts including Roman, Cyrillic, Yiddish and Greek. Conducting research using the ITS material "can be very tedious, so you need to be quite passionate about what you are doing – it's time-consuming and can be very discouraging to spend hours looking for a document," Afoumado said. "It requires a lot of curiosity and common sense, some language skills, and some knowledge of the Holocaust."

The USHMM accepts research requests by email and will help families find out where their relatives perished. "We have a lot of requests from survivors who are seeking compensation for having been in hiding or in ghettos or in camps. Helping survivors is our top priority." The museum also helps children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren of survivors, "some of whom don't know a lot about the Holocaust."

Survivors and families members typically express deep emotions when they finally discover their relatives' names on a list. "It's good to know that sometimes you find information that brings closure to people," Afoumado said. "This is the best reward you can get." ■

LEAVE A LEGACY OF COMMEMORATION AND EDUCATION AT YAD VASHEM'S HOLOCAUST MEMORIAL SITE

The Holocaust Memorial Site at Earl Bales Park in Toronto was constructed by the founders of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to commemorate loved ones who perished in the Holocaust and survivors who rebuilt their lives in Canada and have since passed on.

Under the leadership of Fran Sonshine, National Chair, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has revitalized the Holocaust Memorial Site, which now features 25 new memorial elements that include stunning monuments, pillars, walls, and gardens.

Among these are the Ed and Fran Sonshine Children's Memorial Wall, which commemorates the 1.5 million Jewish children who perished in the Holocaust, and the Dominion Family Tree Heroes Wall, which pays tribute to Righteous Among the Nations, non-Jews who risked their lives to rescue Jews during the Holocaust.

The new Memorial Site provides Holocaust survivors, their families, and other community members with a suitable setting to remember loved ones and pay tribute to the heroism of the partisans, ghetto fighters, Allied Armed Forces, and the Righteous among the Nations. The site serves as a backdrop for meaningful events and programs that bring together people of varied faiths to learn about the Holocaust and contemporary issues.

THE CANADIAN SOCIETY FOR YAD VASHEM THANKS ITS GENEROUS DONORS FOR SUPPORTING ITS REMEMBER, REFLECT, RECOMMIT CAMPAIGN.

Survivor writes memoir about starting anew in Canada

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Many Holocaust survivors were unable to speak about the horrific events they lived through. Fortunately, however, some, like Gerda Frieberg, have been able to speak, and their testimony has been heard and recorded.

In her first book, published in 2013, I Kept My Promise, Frieberg writes her family's story.

Born in Upper Silesia, Poland, in 1925, she tells of her happy childhood that was transformed into a nightmare in 1939 when her father was taken away and never seen again.

Teenage sisters Gerda and Hana (Steinitz) and their mother were deported to Jaworzno Ghetto in 1940. In 1942, they were interned in Oberalstadt concentration camp in Germany. Frieberg lost 172 members of her family – she, her sister and her mother were the only survivors.

They were liberated by the Soviet army in 1945 and spent four years in a displaced persons camp in Germany.

Recently, Frieberg published her second volume, Never a Bystander, which begins with her arrival in Canada in 1953. With numerous pictures and documents, she recounts her hardships and her commitment to tell the Holocaust story and to work for human rights.

> When I came to Canada with my husband and a six-week-old baby, I wanted to rebuild a family and the Jewish People.

"When I came to Canada with my husband and a six-week-old baby, I wanted to rebuild a family and the Jewish People. Coming to Canada is where my journey begins."

With hard work and optimism, the Friebergs began to build their family, and eventually a successful real estate development business.

It was at her installation as president of a B'nai Brith chapter in 1964 that she spoke publicly about the Shoah for the first time. Suddenly, she says, many groups approached her to speak about the Holocaust. She has told her story to thousands of students and adults, Jewish and non-Jewish, across the country.

Never a Bystander tells of her rise as a community activist and educator. Frieberg was chair of the founding committee of the Toronto Holocaust Centre, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, founder of the Holocaust Survivors of Canada, and she organized Women for Soviet Jewry.

She has received the 125th Anniversary of Confederation of Canada Medal, the governor general's Meritorious Service Medal, the Elie Wiesel Holocaust Remembrance Award and many more.

"I considered my survival a gift to be dedicated to the memory of the victims of the Shoah. Amid the silence of the world, the plea of the victims, 'Remember us,' became a commandment."

With chutzpah and tenacity, Gerda Frieberg, who could not speak English when she arrived in Canada, has left her indelible mark on her chosen country, Canada.

Frieberg lives in Toronto and has two children, Josey and Jack, six grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. ■

CAMP RAMAH IN CANADA

Cattle car at centre of U of Guelph exhibit

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

When Jordana Lebowitz took on the role of Hillel's Holocaust Education Week co-ordinator, she thought long and hard about arranging a memorable campus program.

"I felt like I should go big, or go home," said the 20-year-old Thornhill native who is studying psychology at the University of Guelph.

"I wanted to help every person connect on a personal level to the Holocaust, not just those who have survivor loved ones or share the history. I wanted to bring something to campus to make them feel it."

About seven months ago, Lebowitz began co-ordinating her ambitious plan to bring to her campus a replica of a cattle car used to transport Jews from ghettos to concentration camps.

"When I came up with the idea, I was telling friends and family, and they all thought it was crazy and didn't know if I could do it. But I wanted to prove them wrong, that I could do this," she said with a laugh.

She said she wanted to create an exhibit that resonates not only with the Jewish students on campus, but with the non-Jews as well.

"I wanted them to have something tangible to connect to. Maybe they would go in the cattle car and feel scared, or cramped, see how dark it is," she said.

Lebowitz said locating the kind of cattle car she was looking for was no easy task.

"I started calling around, calling anyplace I could think of that would have a cattle car," she said.

"In all of North America, there are only two cattle car exhibits. One at the Paper Clips memorial in Tennessee and one at the Holocaust museum in Washington."

She tried the Halton County Radial Railway, a museum that gives visitors access to ride in old streetcars and trains, as well as farms – any places she could think of that might have access to a cattle car.

She said that in her search, she got in touch with a man who worked as a GO train operator in Toronto. He told her that on his route to and from Union Station, he passed a 1920s-era German cattle car replica, which was exactly what Lebowitz was looking for.

"I couldn't believe it. I was in shock," she said.

She learned that the cattle car belonged to a Toronto-based prop company that supplies a variety of vehicles for film production.

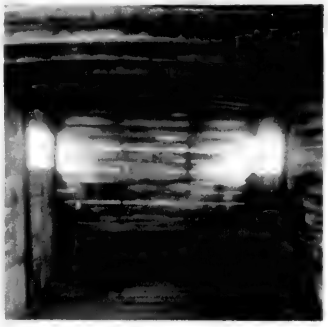
"They offered to donate the car for a week, so that was amazing," she said.

"I went to Hillel to tell them about what I had found, and what I wanted to do and they loved the idea and agreed to fund it," she said, adding that the cost of shipping the cattle car from Toronto to campus was about $3,000.

She said she worked with university administrators to go through the proper channels to get approval. While she was met with a little bit of resistance initially because of the logistics involved with shipping the car, in the end, administrators recognized the value of such an initiative.

The exhibit, which will be on display in the centre of the campus at Branion Plaza from Nov. 3 to 5, will include information about Adolf Hitler's rise to power, Nazi propaganda, the systematic murder of millions, as well as information about contemporary issues like racial inequality in the United States and recent genocides in Africa.

She said throughout the three days the exhibit will be open, there will be student volunteers providing information about the Holocaust, as well as a psychology professor who will be available to students who may feel negative emotions triggered by the graphic images and disturbing information.



The interior of the railway car

She said next year, she hopes to bring an authentic cattle car – one that was used to transport Jews to concentration camps – from Germany to campus. This initiative, she estimated, would cost about $50,000.

"I think that this program really embodies the eternal importance of Holocaust education and learning from humanity's past mistakes in order to shape a future of equality and tolerance." ■

Hamilton teachers attend U.S. Shoah conference

ABIGAIL CUKIER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, HAMILTON

Deborah Brown

Seven Hamilton, Ont., teachers are excited to get back in the classroom and share what they learned at last month's Ethel LeFrak Holocaust Education Conference at Pennsylvania's Seton Hill University.

Grace Centritto, Carolyn Craven, Deborah Brown, Krista Brodersen, Yvan Brochu, Krzysztof Gumiemak and Tobi Hawthorne, from the Hamilton public and Catholic secondary school boards, attended the conference Oct. 25 to Oct. 27.

The gathering, which takes place every three years, sought to enhance Catholic-Jewish understanding by equipping teachers and faculty members, especially those at Catholic institutions, to enter into discussions on the causes of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust, and to help them create curricular responses.

This year's conference focused on Nostra Aetate, as this October marks the 50th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council's declaration on the Catholic Church's relationship to non-Christian religions. The declaration devoted much of its text to Judaism, rejecting the belief that the Jews bear collective guilt for the death of Jesus, and condemning anti-Semitism at any time, by anyone.

> This will be a great way to bring new dialogue into our classrooms.

"This was an area of which not many of us had a deep understanding," said Deborah Brown, head of the history department at Sir Allan MacNab Secondary School. "We wanted to see how we could take that next step as educators to understand what our students need to know.

"It was a phenomenal conference. I was in awe to be in the same room and to hear from such acclaimed individuals and learn from them. I came back moved and powerfully changed."

Brown says a highlight of the conference for her was listening to a lecture by Father Patrick Desbois, who has devoted his life to researching the Holocaust, fighting anti-Semitism, and furthering relations between Catholics and Jews. Father Desbois is the grandson of a World War II French prisoner held in the Rawa Ruska Camp on the Poland-Ukraine border. He is a Catholic priest and president of Yahad – In Unum, a French organization he founded in 2004 dedicated to identifying and commemorating the sites of Jewish and Roma mass executions in eastern Europe during the war.

"After the sessions would end at 9 p.m., we would stay up talking about how we will use what we learned," Brown said.

"We are creating a learning team to discuss how we can better use rigorous academic research with our students, how we can interpret primary texts to gain a better understanding of religious and ethical choices and relationships in genocide studies.

"Our own stance was certainly enriched, and our understanding was deepened. This will be a great way to bring new dialogue into our classrooms."

Hamilton already has a rich history of Holocaust education. In partnership with the Hamilton Jewish Federation Holocaust Education Committee, many teachers participate in sessions to learn teaching strategies. They also take advantage of resources, including artifacts from World War II to share with students.

The annual Student Symposium on the Holocaust consists of a historical overview of the Holocaust and survivor testimony with a question-and-answer period.

The Holocaust committee also runs an Asper Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program, in which high school applicants take part in sessions on human rights and the Holocaust, as well as participate in a trip to Washington, D.C., including a day at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, and they complete a community service project. ■

Was revenge justice? It's complicated, rabbi says

RON CSILLAG

Rabbi Steven Jacobs RACHEL LEHNER PHOTO

It's a little-known part of post-Holocaust history: After World War II, a small group of Jewish survivors, led by Abba Kovner, the poet and partisan leader, targeted Nazis for assassination. They took the ominous name Hanokmim, Hebrew for "the avengers," and took justice into their own hands.

But was taking revenge against Nazis a form of justice?

That "very complicated" issue was addressed Nov. 1 by Rabbi Steven Jacobs, a professor of Judaic studies at the University of Alabama, in a pre-Holocaust Education Week lecture presented at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

The stage for the Jewish avengers may have been set, Rabbi Jacobs noted, following World War I, when survivors of the Armenian genocide formed Operation Nemesis to kill Turkish leaders who had been responsible for roughly 1.5 million Armenian deaths.

The best known action by the Nokmim was on April 14, 1946, when members sneaked into a bakery and painted diluted arsenic on some 3,000 loaves of bread for the 12,000 German prisoners of war at the Langwasser internment camp near Nuremberg. About 1,900 Germans got "seriously ill," according to a report Rabbi Jacobs cited, and between 300 and 400 died.

Rabbi Jacobs quoted one of the avengers as saying this "was nothing compared with what we really wanted to do."

He also cited the 1993 book An Eye for an Eye: The Untold Story of Jewish Revenge Against Germans in 1945 by John Sack, which detailed another episode: when the Communists took over Poland after the war, they recruited Jewish survivors of concentration camps and other institutions to run internment camps.

"It is estimated that between 60,000 and 80,000 Germans died during that period under the responsibility of Jews," Rabbi Jacobs said, though he did not say how they died.

(Sack's book was widely derided and discredited, with at least one prominent historian noting that the vast majority of those in charge of these camps were not Jews. The German publisher even cancelled the book.)

In any event, "I share this with you to remind you – to remind us – that history, our history, is not always what we wish it to be," Rabbi Jacobs said.

"The stories we tell ourselves omit that which makes us truly uncomfortable and avoid forcing us to confront those questions we would rather not answer," he added. "But I believe as a scholar that the way forward for us as Jews is to understand as completely as possible the past you are trying to uncover, warts and all, [and] recognize both our successes and the errors of our ways."

But was this justice, at a time when the world refused to exercise it?

Jacobs noted that rabbis throughout the ages have argued that revenge is up to God. Yet the Torah, he added, teaches of a person called the goel hadam, or the blood avenger.

Jacobs noted that Jonathan Sacks, the former chief rabbi of the British Commonwealth, argued the words actually translate as blood redeemer, "one who restores equilibrium to the world and rights the wrongs."

"Could we not argue then that the Armenians and Jews are blood redeemers of the world?" Rabbi Jacobs wondered. "Maybe. Maybe not."

Further quoting Rabbi Sacks, Rabbi Jacobs said Jews are not free to take the law into their own hands, and that "passion may not override due process of law."

Wrongs, he said, must be punished only after a fair trial and not just on behalf of victims, but all of society.

So how to reconcile Jewish law with the fact that Jews took the law into their own hands after the Holocaust?

"We do so first by accepting the reality that what was then, with all its agonizing complexity, was then, and this is now," Rabbi Jacobs said. "Second, we refuse to cover over those aspects of our past which remain, at the very least, highly problematic, but equally force us to reject their solutions as our solutions, no matter what."

Jews, he said, must adhere to the rule of law or risk returning to "the law of the jungle, where survival of the fittest is dependent upon both individual and group violence."

The talk was presented by the Wierzbniker Society of Toronto, which marked, with candlelighting, the 73rd anniversary of the Nazi liquidation of the ghetto into which the Jews of the village of Wierzbnik had been herded and subsequently shipped to Treblinka. ■

Bernard Betel Centre marks 50 years of creative living

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For 50 years, the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living has been keeping Toronto seniors engaged in the community, and on Oct. 25, it opened its doors to kick off a year-long celebration in honour of its golden anniversary.

"It was an overwhelming and resounding success," said executive director Gail Gould of the open house event, which spotlighted Betel's past, present and future. And it brought out more than 600 seniors for a day filled with activities, music and dancing.

The National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Toronto section, founded the Centre for Creative Living back in 1965. At the time, it had only 50 members. Eventually, the centre outgrew the NCJW and became its own autonomous organization under the leadership of its first executive director, Rhea Shulman.

Now Betel, as it's lovingly called, serves more than 5,000 seniors, including those who aren't able to leave their homes.

"It's about going where the client or community member is at," Gould said of the centre's Healthy at Home initiative. "These folks can't get out. They can't get to Betel, so we go to them."

Isaac Cohen and Barbara Zigler at the Oct. 25 celebration

For those who are well enough, Betel hosts an array of programs, from computer and fitness classes to dances and even an Israel trip.

It's about "empowering seniors to lead active, creative and healthy lifestyles in a Jewish environment," Gould said of her organization's mission.

It was easy to see this in action at the open house as men and women – speaking mainly in Hebrew, English and Russian – socialized and participated in various activities led by staff and volunteers throughout the day.

During the Oct. 25 event, Gould said that she and her staff rely on more than 400 volunteers, who contribute a combined 40,000 hours each year. That includes an entirely volunteer-based board of directors.

Along with Gould, representatives from all three levels of government addressed the crowd. Toronto Ward 10 Councillor James Pasternak shared greetings from Mayor John Tory, while MPP Monte Kwinter brought the same from Premier Kathleen Wynne. York Centre's MP-elect Michael Levitt also spoke.

Later in the day, the Toronto-based klezmer band Klez Konnection got members, staff, volunteers and visitors dancing. "We do a wild party here at the Betel Centre," said Gould, laughing.

Gould is currently in the process of organizing additional 50th anniversary events along with the planning committee's co-chair and board member Bonnie Baker.

"Whether we have lectures or trips or concerts, we have a variety of things that are in the works," Gould said. "And we hope the community will come out to enjoy and continue to celebrate." ■

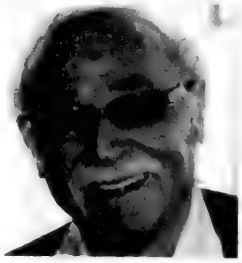
Boxing promoter was larger-than-life figure



Irving Ungerman

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Irving Ungerman fought his way out of the old Jewish neighbourhood of Kensington Market, both as a featherweight boxer and as a savvy businessman.

He found success in the poultry business and used his wealth to support charities in the Jewish community and beyond.

Along the way, he raised a family, taught them self-reliance and self-respect, helped countless individuals better their lots in life, managed nationally ranked boxers, and though a recipient of the Order of Ontario and the Diamond Jubilee Award, never lost the common touch. Ungerman passed away last week of a stroke at age 92.

Hundreds of mourners gathered at Beth Sholom Synagogue to pay their last respects, including a Toronto Police Service honour guard and an RCMP honour guard.

Ungerman was remembered as a larger-than-life figure, a bold, risk-taking entrepreneur with a heart of gold. Two of his daughters and several grandchildren delivered eulogies describing his profound and long-lasting impact on their lives.

Temmi Ungerman Sears said that despite several serious medical issues that plagued him in recent years, her father retained his boundless energy. "There was no one who could keep pace with this man," she said.

At age 15, he was a champion featherweight boxer at only 105 pounds. He never set aside his love of the sport, teaching it while serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II and working the corners in more than 100 fights subsequently. He managed Canadian champions to world title bids, she said.

Known for managing national champions George Chuvalo and Clyde Gray, Ungerman was inducted into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame in 1973.

At the same time, he was a proud Jew who supported Israel and he took pride in helping raise funds for the country during the 1973 Yom Kippur War. He also was involved in the wider community, and was one of the original directors of the Toronto Santa Claus Parade. Riding along in the parade and wearing a red nose, he'd hand out candy to the kids on the parade route. It's not clear who enjoyed it more, him or the kids, Ungerman Sears stated.

His generosity was legendary, she continued. Once while sharing a hospital room with a man named "George," he learned his roommate needed financial assistance for a specialized heart valve or his life would be at risk. He wrote a cheque for $35,000 to the hospital to help him.

He wasn't large in stature, but he was a giant of a man, Ungerman Sears said.

Shelley Sukerman, his other daughter, recalled her father as someone who "liked a good fight and never, never, never gave up."

His was "a life well lived. Most people just live their lives. You owned yours," she said of her father.

Several of Ungerman's grandchildren described the life lessons they absorbed from him. "Since day one, I was enrolled in the Irving Ungerman school of hard knocks," said grandson Jeremy Ungerman Sears.

Dylan Ungerman Sears recalled her grandfather was known as "the chicken man" and a "boxing legend."

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich noted that Ungerman and his wife, Sylvia, were great benefactors of Beth Sholom. On meeting Ungerman in his office, he noted that it was brimming with photos and memorabilia that spilled out everywhere. It was "as if he had been everywhere, maybe all at once," Rabbi Flanzraich said.

Ungerman was devoted to his family, including his brothers and sisters who predeceased him. He stood on his own and from an early age, learned "to fight and to squeeze everything from life," the rabbi said.

At least two of the fighters Ungerman managed attended the funeral – former Canadian welterweight champion Donovan Boucher and Canadian and Commonwealth welterweight champion Clyde Gray.

"Irv was the best," Gray said. "He was always there for you."

Gray, who fought in the 1960s and 1970s, said Ungerman helped support him by giving him a job as a truck driver, which permitted him to train in the afternoons. He arranged several world title fights, he added.

Evelyn Gray, Clyde's wife, said Ungerman "was the go-to guy." Even the Dundees, who managed Muhammad Ali, "came to Irv. He had the connections, the name, the ability. He had the fighters. He managed the two biggest fighters in Canadian history [Chuvalo and Gray]," she said. ■

Baseball isn't the only thing that brings us together

Shoel Silver, Felicia Posluns and Ruth Ekstein

In the end, the Toronto Blue Jays failed to make it to the World Series. Nevertheless, the three months from August to October were tremendously exciting in Toronto, as the Jays began an unanticipated run toward the top of the American League.

One of the most enjoyable aspects of the Jays' autumn was the way it brought the city together. Fans and non-fans alike were swept up in the passion. It was not uncommon to see total strangers high-fiving or even hugging, in reaction to heroics on the field or at bat. The feeling of unity was palpable.

The Blue Jays' advance coincided with the principal phase of the United Jewish Appeal campaign, which we have the honour to chair this year. Together with more than 600 volunteers and a group of dedicated professionals, we endeavoured to raise the funds that help more than 100 organizations and schools look after Jews in need today and secure a knowledgeable and caring Jewish community for tomorrow.

UJA's work encompasses four pillars of activity (that's three more Pillars than the Blue Jays had):

- We care for the vulnerable and those in need. Twenty-four thousand of us live below the poverty line, and many of our seniors live in isolation.
- We improve access to Jewish education and identity programs. From preschool through campus, we give our young people multiple paths to strengthen their connection to their Jewish roots.
- We improve the quality of life for Israelis and for Jews abroad facing conflict and anti-Semitism. In areas far from the centre of Israel or too close to rocket launchers, we enhance education and health care and help to stabilize communities and create opportunities for growth.
- We speak up for our community and for our brothers and sisters in Israel. The Jews of the GTA have interests and concerns, and we make the case on Parliament Hill, at Queen's Park, at city hall and to the media.

And the key is, we do all of it together. The United Jewish Appeal means Jews united to help each other. What brought Toronto together this fall were the exploits of a baseball team. What brings our community together year after year is the pull of a heritage thousands of years in the making, an innate sense of mutual responsibility, pride in the values and culture of a small people with a large profile and determination that the legacy we received will not end with us. What brings us together is the recognition that we are more than a community – we are a family.

Now, it's true that what our agencies do every single day doesn't happen in a stadium or in front of television cameras. And there are no cheering crowds. But when a volunteer delivers a meal to a Holocaust survivor living alone, or takes her to a social event; when a young woman learns a new skill and finds a job, or receives an interest-free loan to start a new business; when a child living through a rocket barrage on the Israeli border receives psychological counselling to help him cope, or a newly elected member of Parliament comes to understand that child's plight – each of these occasions and countless others are worthy of a high-five and a communal hug.

And it is United Jewish Appeal contributions that make it possible. Whether through our overseas partners, the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Joint Distribution Committee, or the range of local agencies, schools and other affiliates in the UJA family, including Jewish Vocational Service, Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Addiction Community Services, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and the Jewish community centres, if you are a donor, you are changing lives. If you aren't, it's not too late to join our team.

JAFI, JDC, JVS, JF&CS, JACS, JIAS, JCCs, and so many more. What a lineup. Go "J"s go! ■

Shoel Silver and Felicia Posluns are the chairs of this year's UJA annual campaign. Ruth Ekstein is chair of UJA's women's philanthropy.

NDPer tours death camp she joked about on Facebook

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Avi Benlolo, left, and Max Eisen at the Vienna Wiesenthal Institute for Holocaust Studies

Alex Johnstone, the Hamilton-area NDP candidate who was embroiled in controversy following the resurfacing of a Facebook comment in which she made a penis joke about an electrical fence at Auschwitz, joined the latest From Compassion to Action tour organized by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies during which she visited the notorious death camp.

In September, Johnstone, who ran in the recent federal election, made international news after a satirical online publication dug up a seven-year-old Facebook comment about Auschwitz's "infamous Pollish (sic), phallic, hydro posts."

Johnstone promptly apologized for the gaffe and told reporters, "I didn't know what Auschwitz was, or I didn't up until today."

When FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo heard the story, he invited Johnstone to join a 28-person delegation of law enforcement professionals, government officials, and Catholic school educators that travelled to Austria, Poland and Israel from Oct. 11 to 18.

Johnstone, who only joined the trip for the programming in Austria and Poland – which included a tour of Auschwitz and other historical sites related to the Shoah, and marked the first time she had ever travelled overseas – thanked Benlolo for the invitation, adding that the trip "had a deeply profound impact" on her.

"Some of the more profound moments was having the honour of meeting with Auschwitz survivor Max Eisen who shared his personal and horrific memories as we walked through the grounds," she said.

"Seeing the two tons of human hair from Auschwitz victims just gutted me. Walking along the electric fence, and seeing the ovens, you imagine all the people, all the moms, the dads, their children, the horrors that were enacted against them."

Benlolo, who has been leading these tours since 2010, said influential Canadians are invited on the tours to teach them about the devastating effect racism can have on humanity.

"Who are the front line people in our society? Who are the people who will respond to hate and crime and anti-Semitic attacks and need to have the best understanding? It is in our interest to have them educated and to understand the issues that we're dealing with as a community," Benlolo said.

"Obviously for the educators, it's the same thing. They're educating the next generation of students and we want them to understand the history and the legacy of the Holocaust and what Israel is dealing with on a daily basis. All of these people have a huge network of people around them and can influence them and that is the objective."

Moose Jaw Police Chief Rick Bourassa, who joined the tour, said although he had been taught about the Holocaust as a student, visiting the Auschwitz concentration camp gave him a deeper understanding.

"I'd seen the videos and the pictures and it is one thing to see those things at a distance without it being connected with someone and to understand intellectually what happened, but to actually be standing there, with Max, with a survivor, brought it to a whole new level of awareness," Bourassa said.

"It was almost a bit of a sick feeling I had in my stomach. For a moment I sensed what it must have felt like for those people who were going through those gates, not knowing what awaited them."

Benlolo said the tour, which ended in Israel, helped the delegates understand the Jewish community's reaction to anti-Semitism and anti-Israel rhetoric.

"We wanted them to understand why Israel reacts the way it does for security reasons, why it reacts the way it does to Iran, and why the Jewish community here gets upset about various contemporary issues, like campus anti-Semitism," Benlolo said.

Bourassa said the lessons he learned on the tour can be applied to Canadian society today.

"What it really brought home to me was the importance of inclusive communities and making sure that there aren't divisions, whether they be social, economical, psychological, physical, whatever those barriers are... It's so important we keep them removed."

Johnstone agreed, and said, "After seeing what hate can amount to, I'm very concerned about the rise in racism and anti-Semitism and hate in our world today. Hate can be found everywhere, from our speech to our actions. I walked away thinking that we have to work harder to dissipate the hate that exists in our society." ■

Zareinu students get ready to shine at annual show

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Thirteen-year-old Madison Tevlin, a former Zareinu Educational Centre student with Down syndrome, has defied the odds, as very few people with Down syndrome are ever able to sing.

Madison has earned her place in the spotlight, though, with more than seven million hits on her YouTube channel, a song recorded with Cody Simpson and O.A.R., and a live performance at the Special Olympics.

Madison's story is one of inspiration, dedication, passion, and effort – words that can also be applied to the staff and students of Zareinu.

Madison's mother, Grace Tevlin, said that when Madison was born, doctors told her "She may talk, she may not." From that moment on, Grace made communication a priority in Madison's life, and "Zareinu was a tremendous help in this process," she said.

Madison will be a keynote speaker and model in the 12th annual Zareinu Fashion Show, whose theme this year is Luxe and Glamour. It will be held Nov. 10 at Bellvue Manor in Vaughan.

Hosted by fashion icon Jeanne Beker, it will feature professional models alongside special-needs Zareinu students who will all take to the catwalk and model exclusive collections from a variety of prestigious Canadian and international designers, including Ines DiSanto, Ross Mayer, Versace, Strellson and Town Shoes.

The show is an opportunity for Zareinu children to shine in their own unique ways. There's never a dry eye in the house as guests cheer on these mini champions who have each overcome their own challenges to proudly strut, walk or wheel down the runway.

Zareinu is a school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental challenges. For more than 25 years, it's provided individualized evidence-based programs to hundreds of students with special needs in supportive learning environments.

Two-year-old Zareinu student Darwin Joseph will be making her way down the runway with help from her father. Darwin has Prader-Willi syndrome (PWS), a genetic disorder that occurs in approximately one out of every 15,000 births. Its common characteristics include small hands and feet, abnormal growth and body composition (small stature, very low lean body mass, and early-onset childhood obesity), weak muscles at birth, insatiable hunger and intellectual disability.

Darwin Joseph as a flower girl at her aunt's wedding this past summer

"Darwin came to Zareinu when she was about 10 months old. She didn't move. She couldn't keep her trunk – torso – up and she couldn't put any weight on her legs," Zareinu's head physiotherapist, Ester Fink, told The CJN.

"Postural control or the ability to pull against gravity and maintain the body in space is necessary for the development of movement. Darwin, because of low muscle tone, could not resist gravity, so she couldn't stand or move in space. We worked on her trunk control, or the ability to hold herself up, without support. As she gained trunk control, we held her only by the legs and carefully moved her legs to challenge her ability to maintain her balance in space. And only after she developed some balance did she start moving on her own."

Therapy includes giving parents a structured home program. "We videotape and practise at school so the parents feel confident at home," Fink said.

"Zareinu has changed Darwin's world, my world and our outlook as to what we think Darwin can accomplish in life. Zareinu showed us that Darwin will walk, be potty trained and go to school. It was very hard to believe that in the darkest times right after the diagnosis," said her father, Mark Joseph.

Proceeds from this year's fashion show will support Zareinu's goal to expand community-based services.

"Our expansion of Zareinu classrooms in the Jewish day school system, for instance, can lead to an increase in opportunities for student to be included in the mainstream of that system," said spokesperson Jenna Greenberg. ■

Current violence part of a jihad, Israeli expert says

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

The latest violence in Israel over the last several weeks is a link in a long chain of jihad against Israel and Jews, Mordechai Kedar told a dozen Jewish community leaders in Halifax late last month.

The assistant professor from Bar-Ilan University was concluding a Canadian speaking tour Oct. 22 that took him to Regina and several Ontario centres, including Toronto, Kitchener and Hamilton. He's considered an academic expert on the Israeli-Arab population and is a researcher in Islam, Islamic movements and gender issues, Arabic mass media and popular culture in the Arab world.

"There is nothing different today than decades ago, but this is not at the level of mass killing of the intifadah of say, 14 years ago, when buses were blown up, causing a massive number of casualties. Today, the knife is fashionable because of the way ISIS uses it."

Fluent in English, Hebrew and Arabic, the 1998 PhD graduate from Bar-Ilan showed a series of Arab pictures and political cartoons stressing how that community sees itself – images of Arabs holding Jews at bay with knives and depicting triumph over Jews, with drawings of the Temple Mount in the background.

> In every encounter between violent and non-violent groups, the violent always prevail.

Photographs that appeared in the news media displayed signs at funerals of Arab "martyrs" killed while perpetrating attacks, stating "Killing brings us closer to Allah" and "Killing of Zionists is part of the worship of Allah."

"These are disseminated by the mass media and social media," Kedar said. "It is a holy war, but Israeli Jews who are without religion in their daily lives can't understand a holy war. They attribute the attacks on Jews and the hatred of Jews on economics, human rights and other issues."

He admitted that there are educated, modern Arabs who would live in peace and recognize Israel as a state, and they are not violent people.

"However, in every encounter between violent and non-violent groups, the violent always prevail... and the foundation is religion."

He stressed Israel's story of success, discussing how Israel attained its sovereignty, renewed its Hebrew language, and became a modern, democratic country with the longest life expectancy in the region.

"In every criteria, Israel is a story of great success," he noted.

"The Arabs hate each other, kill each other. They envy us and they hate us," he added.

"Arab countries think that if you project power and the readiness to use it, people won't mess with you. That is their mindset. If you're perceived to beg for peace, you're disrespected, humiliated, subjugated. But we know that when peace is resolved, you're respected."

He concluded that the support Israel has within its borders and from democratic nations throughout the world gives it power. ■

Peace song, Isaiah's message featured in music video

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

On Nov. 11, Canadians will gather at cenotaphs, schools, churches, synagogues and other public places to mark the sacrifices of Canadian soldiers in armed conflicts around the world.

To make the 70th anniversary of the end of World War II even more significant, March of the Living Canada (MOL) is asking schools taking part in Remembrance Day activities to add the video of a unique peace song to their memorials – Lay Down Your Arms.

Written by a wounded Israeli veteran of the Yom Kippur War to honour his fallen comrades, with lyrics by a Canadian songwriter and a bridge by a local musician, the song "has Canadian content and a universal message," said MOL national director Eli Rubenstein.

It is a message that would be appreciated by Canadian soldiers who made the ultimate sacrifice – that their efforts should lead to a world at peace, he said.

In the original Hebrew version, songwriter Doron Levinson incorporated text from the book of Isaiah, including the famous lines: "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation shall no longer raise up arms against nation, neither shall they teach their children war anymore."

The March of the Living Children's Choir sings Lay Down Your Arms at Auschwitz on Yom Hashoah 2015.

Working with Levinson's melody, lyricist Lisa Catherine Cohen updated and modernized the words rather than simply translate the Isaiah text. Harry Lewis wrote the bridge, said Rubenstein.

First recorded in Toronto more than 20 years ago by the Habonim Youth Choir, it was only recently made into a music video with new arrangements by Habonim Cantor Aviva Rajsky and guitarist Tom Bellman.

The recent version featured the March of the Living Children's Choir as well as the Habonim Youth Choir. It was performed on Holocaust Remembrance Day during a MOL ceremony at Auschwitz-Birkenau before 10,000 people. It was also performed at the Tempel Synagogue in Krakow and in Israel at the Mini-Israel park near Latrun, between Yom Hazikaron, which honours Israel's war dead, and Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

The music video included excerpts from those performances as well a rehearsal in Toronto.

Adding a unique element to the video, the Israel Museum gave permission to include images from the Dead Sea Scrolls, specifically the Great Isaiah Scroll, the oldest known version of the biblical book.

"In the video you see lines written 2,200 to 2,300 years ago, on cracked parchment," Rubenstein said. "It's interesting to think that in 2015, with all sorts of modern technology, we're reading something written in the hills of Judea 2,500 years ago. Look how powerful that message is.

"They remind us how far we have to go to build a world of peace."

In Cohen's updated English-language lyrics, the song ends with the stanza: "Somewhere deep inside the soldier, there's a dreamer/ Dreaming of a world of peace/ Lay down your arms/ Let time heal every wound/ And love will someday set us free."

The last line of the song is meant as a counterpoint to the cynical message the Nazis incorporated on an iron gate at Auschwitz, that work will set you free. And the line, "Every hand that holds a sword can hold a baby," is particularly relevant during the current "knife intifada," Rubenstein said.

MOL staff sent copies of the video and sheet music to schools, with the suggestion they play video of the song during Remembrance Day commemorations and learn the song for future memorial events.

"In a world still scarred by war and violence, with the threat of further turmoil looming on the horizon, the message of Lay Down Your Arms is as timeless and as needed as ever," Rubenstein stated. ■

Veterans look back at World War II service

plungen@thecjn.ca

Morris Polansky was a teenage farm boy living in Oxbow, Sask. when he made his way to Winnipeg to enlist in the Canadian Armed Forces. Only 19 at the time, he had wanted to volunteer the year before, but some grizzled veterans from World War I advised him to finish high school first. Likely they knew what he was getting himself into and that there was no hurry to get into the fight.

It was still 1940 and there was plenty of action to be seen by Polansky and others who volunteered to join the Canadian Armed Forces. Now 94, Polansky and fellow Jewish veterans Lorne Winer, 97, and Jerry Rosenberg, 93, recalled their military experiences, which saw intense fighting, close calls, the loss of comrades-in-arms and ultimately, victory over the Nazi beast.

As they have for years, the three will participate in Remembrance Day ceremonies on Nov. 11 to honour those who made the ultimate sacrifice. Winer and Rosenberg will be part of a contingent of Jewish war veterans of the General Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, marking the moment at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Spadina and Bloor. Polansky will be at Toronto Centre for the Arts, in North York, where he will lay a wreath during the services, just as he has done for several years.

Their stories are typical of the thousands of young Jewish men who volunteered to serve during World War II. Jews enlisted in far greater numbers than their proportion of the population would have warranted in 1940s Canada. An estimated 10 per cent of Jews joined one of the branches of the Canadian Armed Forces.

For Polansky, at first it was the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps. Coming from rural Canada, he was mightily impressed with an ad that ran on CKY radio in Winnipeg that announced the army was looking for 400 truck drivers. "I could hardly wait," he said.

Pretty soon afterwards, however, he transferred into a unit that maintained and repaired electrical devices, including portable generators used in field medical units.

The closest he came to a life and death experience was when in late 1943 the German air force bombed the transport ship he was on, en route to Italy. Luckily most of the soldiers were successfully evacuated in lifeboats before the ship sank, he said. Polansky saw duty in Italy. His unit was later transferred to the fighting in Belgium and Holland.

Rosenberg's military service was entirely at sea. Unusual for most Jewish recruits, who chose the air force or the army, Rosenberg enlisted in the Royal Canadian Navy in 1940 and saw duty as a signal man on board a variety of corvettes. The small warships saw convoy duty, escorting merchant vessels from Canada to Britain. The ships were targeted by German submariners, and Winer was part of convoy SC 42 (the 42nd slow convoy), which was devastated by Nazi wolf packs that preyed on lightly defended ships. There was 64 ships in the convoy and only four escorts, including Rosenberg's corvette, he said.

Arrayed against them was a group of 14 U-boats. One or two subs would attack and draw off the defenders, recalled Rosenberg, and then other U-boats would come in and attack the merchant ships. At the end of the engagement, 16 merchant ships were sunk and two others were damaged.

Rosenberg, luckily, escaped that fate. "I was never on a ship that was sunk," he said. But one incident came pretty close. A miscommunication between the captain on the bridge and a fire-control officer below decks, who spoke through communication tubes, led the officer to release depth charges set for 60 feet while the ship was travelling at only six knots. The depth charges exploded almost below the ship and lifted the stern clear out of the water, Rosenberg said.

Winer, too, was no stranger to friendly fire incidents. Arriving in France on D+30, 30 days after the June 6, 1944 D-Day invasion of Normandy, he was a member of the Second Canadian Survey Regiment of the Royal Canadian Artillery.

Soon after arrival, he was at the front, participating in the battle to liberate Caen. The town was pulverized during the war, but the closest his unit came to destruction was during the many sorties by Allied air forces, which mistakenly dropped bombs on his unit, killing Canadian soldiers, he said.

Winer's unit helped liberate Caen and then was part of the battle to trap a German army at Falaise. He saw action for the rest of the war as Canadian forces headed north, eventually liberating Holland.

He survived, but many others did not. He recalls meeting fellow Jewish Canadian, Harry Black, in England and spending some time with him in Cardiff, Wales. Black had enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force and by the time they met, he was on leave after having flown multiple missions. Most of his friends had been killed and Black told Winer he didn't expect to survive much longer. Sure enough, soon after returning to duty, he was pronounced missing in action, Winer recalled.

The war ended in May 1945, 70 years ago, but Canadians haven't forgotten.

For the past 11 years prior to Remembrance Day, Polansky has been a fixture at Yonge and Eglinton, where he hands out poppies. "It's surprising how many people come up and thank you for what you've done," he said.

Winer, who participates at the Bloor JCC ceremonies, said passers-by take an interest in proceedings. "When I wear my beret and uniform, I have a lot of people come over to me and thank me," he said. ■

The evening, held at Montreal's Sofitel Hotel, also saw the announcement of a new technological tool intended to deepen understanding of the Holocaust, according to particular interests.

Azrieli unveiled Re:Collection, an interactive multimedia platform, which is expected to be fully operational at the end of the year for both desktop and mobile devices. Guests had a chance to try it themselves on tablets provided, with the assistance of the program's digital platform manager Tim MacKay. (The Azrieli Foundation held a similar event Oct. 22 at the Carlu in Toronto.)

Users can explore the first-hand accounts of survivors – 15 of the authors are included for now – through memoir excerpts, video clips, photos and many other materials collected. They can relate these individual stories to historical themes, such as the prewar life, ghettos, deportation and the camps, as well as more universal themes like family, religion, discrimination and immigration.

This platform also allows for connections to be made among the survivors who share common experiences. Timelines and maps can be created to put information in context.

"We are honoured that they have entrusted us with their legacies," said Azrieli.

Her Polish-born father, who passed away in 2014, regarded memoir publication as "a second liberation" for his fellow survivors, freeing them to tell their stories without fear.

These first-hand accounts provide lessons for youth today, the Azrieli Foundation believes, not only in the dangers of racism, but in courage and resilience.

Vertes, a vigorous 91 who was born into a poor family in Hungary, said he hesitated for many years to write his memoirs, worried about his "broken English" and the buried memories it would awaken.

"It took me 18 months of sleepless nights to finish," said Vertes. He is grateful for the professional polishing the Azrieli Foundation gave his manuscript, and especially the patience and kindness of its staff. Vertes figures more than 800 phone calls and more than 4,000 emails were exchanged before the book was off the press.

As the title indicates, Vertes felt completely alone during the Holocaust. A shoemaker by trade, Vertes was 20 in 1944 when the Nazis occupied Hungary.

He escaped a forced labour detail and survived by assuming a false identity. His liberation was short-lived: he was captured by the new Soviet regime and forced into two years of hard labour.

He became very ill and remembers seeing after his recovery the grave that had been dug for him.

After the 1956 revolution, Vertes and his wife Vera and their baby son George made a new, but not easy, life in Montreal. The freedom from fear was what he most appreciated here. Vertes' greatest joy is that George, their only child, became a doctor, and he now has three grandchildren.

Last month, Vertes received the Governor General's Caring Canadian Award in recognition of his long volunteer service, speaking to young people and helping many survivors apply for German reparations.

Myers, née Szpajzer, was born in Paris in 1931 to Polish parents. Her memoir is as much a tribute to her strong and resourceful widowed mother as it is about herself, she said.
